THE LEGACY OF FLIGHT 191

‘EVERYONE WHO DIED WAS A HERO’

STACEY WESCOTT/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Kevin Moncrieff, an airline pilot, walks last week in the field where American Airlines Flight 191 crashed out of O’Hare in 1979. Moncrieff's dad was one of 273 who died.

40 years after 273 died in Flight 191 crash, there is no forgetting for some

BY JOHN KEILMAN
Chicago Tribune

The memorial to America’s deadliest airline accident can be found at a busy street corner in Des Plaines, just down the road from where American Airlines Flight 191 plunged to earth moments after takeoff from O’Hare International Airport on May 25, 1979.

It’s a subtle tribute — a small bronze plaque and a knee-high garden wall whose bricks hold the names of the 273 people who died. The memorial blends into Lake Park so seamlessly you might not even know it’s there.

Forty years after the crash, some who lost loved ones wonder if Flight 191 itself has also faded into the background.

“I hope they remember this crash for all these people who died,” said Michael Adduci, whose 23-year-old sister Kathleen was on board the Los Angeles-bound plane. “It seems as time goes on, people don’t even know what you’re talking about if you mention it to them.”

For the families, there is no forgetting. On the 40th anniversary, many are expected to gather at the memorial — located at the corner of Touhy Avenue and Lee Street — for a 2 p.m. service.

There, they’ll get the chance to recall those who perished, and to nurture a community among those who know what it’s like to have a happy life

When engine fell off a DC-10 at O’Hare, air travel changed forever

BY LAUREN ZUMBACH
Chicago Tribune

As 258 passengers filed on to American Airlines Flight 191 at O’Hare International Airport the Friday before Memorial Day in 1979, nothing suggested that they would never reach Los Angeles.

They would have listened to the flight attendant instruct them how to buckle the seatbelts and where to find the emergency exits.

None of that would matter.

As the three-engine McDonnell Douglas DC-10 accelerated down the runway, reaching takeoff speed, the left engine broke away, vaulting over the aircraft’s wing. The pilots heard a thunk.

“Damn,” one of the pilots said.

It would be the last word captured by the cockpit voice recorder.

The plane continued to rise, its wings level, despite the nearly 13,500 pounds suddenly missing from its left side. But as it reached 300 feet, the plane slowed and rolled left until it began to overturn, its nose tipping down.

After just 31 seconds of flight, the plane plunged back to Earth, killing all 258 passengers and 13 crew members aboard. Two people on the ground were also killed.

The wreckage strafed an open field and mobile home park, scattering debris and erupting into

Calls swell for Trump impeachment probe

McGahn’s empty chair at hearing enrages Dems

BY MARY CLARE JALONICK AND LISA MASCARO
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — More Democrats are calling — and more loudly — for impeachment proceedings against President Donald Trump after his latest defiance of Congress by blocking his former White House lawyer from testifying on Tuesday.

A growing number of rank-and-file House Democrats, incensed by former counsel Donald McGahn’s empty chair in the Judiciary Committee hearing room, are confronting House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and pushing her and other leaders to act. Their impatience is running up against the speaker’s preference for a more methodical approach, including already-unfolding court battles.

Pelosi summoned some of them — still a small fraction of the House Democratic caucus — to a meeting of investigators Wednesday to assess strategy.

Some other Democratic leaders, while backing Pelosi, signaled that a march to impeachment may at some point become inevitable.

“We are confronting what might be the largest, broadest cover-up in American history,” House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer told reporters. If a House inquiry “leads to other avenues including impeachment,” the Maryland Democrat said, “so be it.”

Reps. Joaquin Castro, of Texas, and Diana DeGette, of Colorado,

Ald. Edward Burke stands in the back row, center, as aldermen are sworn in during an inauguration ceremony Monday.

John Kass

Who pays the cost of political corruption?

There was that moment in her inauguration speech when Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot reduced politics to its base elements, the leveraging of public service for personal treasure.

You can call it the Chicago Way and pretend it's unique to the city by the lake. But it's also the Swamp in Washington, or whatever they call it in New Orleans, Baltimore or Los Angeles. It's the same everywhere for the people who pay the costs of corruption.

"The family with the bungalow," said Lightfoot, the former federal prosecutor. "The lady who runs the hair salon. The guy who owns the store on the corner ..."

And I thought of my father and uncle, immigrant shopkeepers, and how hard they worked at our family store on the South Side, and how worried they were about Chicago's City Hall and the city inspectors who just loved steak.

How do I know they loved steak? I was the little boy who filled up their shopping bags, with pound after pound of rib-eye steaks, red and juicy and flat and thick, while we at home ate the brown, older steaks that we couldn't, wouldn't sell.

"Thanks, Greek," they'd say to my dad, with a smile, brushing past, smelling of cigarettes and aftershave.

I hated it then. And now, I hope Lightfoot succeeds.

Up on the stage the other day, she turned, faced the aldermen seated behind her and told them that their days of leveraging public service for cash were over.

"No official in the city of Chicago, elected or appointed, should ever profit from his or her office. Never. Ever."

There were no dragons up on stage with her, breathing fire. But if you looked closely, you might have seen the dragons dancing in her eyes.

Will it work? Is Chicago ready for reform? Or is this another joke played on the broken city that used to work?

"When public officials cut shady backroom deals, they get rich and the rest of us get the bill," Lightfoot said. "Some people get their property taxes cut in exchange for campaign cash, they get the money, and sure enough, we get the bill."

She didn't have to mention his name. She was talking of longtime Ald. Ed Burke, 14th, and Chicago Democratic Party bosses of his ilk. Burke has been an alderman for more than 50 years, and in that time he's perfected Chicago's art of the deal:

Give the alderman your real-estate property tax reduction business, to reduce the same taxes he helped increase. And let politics do its work.

Burke has been charged with one count of extortion in a federal corruption probe. Thousands of his telephone conversations were recorded. Lightfoot hopes that if federal indictments are handed down, the transcripts will embarrass, if not compromise, those aldermen who oppose her reforms, and that way make it easier for her to deal with them.

Ald. Ray Lopez, a member of the Burke clique from the neighboring 15th Ward, was furious. As a gay man, he said he hoped Lightfoot, Chicago's first openly gay mayor, would give a speech of celebration.

But when she turned and faced the aldermen, Lopez told WGN-AM radio that it was if she were saying: "Everyone standing behind me's corrupt, and I'm defending you against them and their evil mechanism," although the station didn't identify him as a Burkean.

"She put her back to the people and gave almost the entire City Council a dirty look as if we all have some kind of nefarious plot in our backyards to steal from everyone we come in contact with. And now the campaign's over," Lopez said.

And now the fight begins.

Some journalists may be hoping for Council Wars 2.0, recalling the epic battle between the late Mayor Harold Washington and the so-called Vrdolyak 29, of which Burke was a leader.

But Lightfoot, who received more than 70 percent of the vote, didn't campaign as a new Washington, as some messianic political figure promising to take from some aldermen and give to others. She has promised to weaken them all and strengthen her central authority.

Former Mayor Rahm Emanuel was seated up there behind her, with the aldermen, beaming, perhaps thinking of his new gig as a pundit for ABC News and for The Atlantic, and his essay "It's Time to Hold American Elites Accountable for Their Abuses," which was published on Tuesday.

That The Atlantic even gives him a place to peddle that stuff, without Rahm ever acknowledging that he was the elite mayor who sat on the Laquan McDonald police shooting video until his 2015 re-election was safe, speaks volumes about American journalism.

It would be fitting, then, if he were awarded the Pulitzer for commentary. Then the farce would be complete.

And why not? Rahm might do well as a pundit, but I don't think he'll expose the congressmen or U.S. senators whose spouses are lobbyists or who have children who work for companies that gorge on government leverage.

Journalists tend to think of Chicago aldermen as subhuman, while seeing the Washington political class as having excellent table manners as they make fine toasts at White House correspondents' dinners.

The politicos lives large. The senator and the congressman and the senior federal bureaucrat whose spouse is a network TV media celebrity are in the milk and the honey.

But as Lightfoot said, the shopkeeper pays, as does the family in the bungalow, and the lady with the hair salon.

Mayor should launch Chicago-style Green New Deal

Heidi Stevens
Balancing Act

BRIAN CASSELLA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mayor Lori Lightfoot in her City Hall office after signing an executive order on aldermanic prerogative after being sworn in as mayor on Monday.

Welcome to your first day on the job, Mayor Lori Lightfoot. I have an idea.

Create a Green New Deal for Chicago.

The Green New Deal, a resolution aimed at combating climate change, urges the federal government to adopt policies that create renewable energy jobs, provide clean air and water, work toward net-zero greenhouse gas emissions and, in the process, reduce systematic racial, social and economic injustice.

Congress may or may not pass the plan, introduced in February by Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez of New York in the House and Sen. Edward Markey of Massachusetts in the Senate. Illinois Democrats Jesus "Chuy" Garcia, Danny Davis, Mike Quigley and Jan Schakowsky have signed on as co-sponsors in the House. As of last week, Dick Durbin and Tammy Duckworth had not yet signed on in the Senate.

But Chicago could adopt its own Green New Deal, modeled on Ocasio-Cortez's and Markey's resolution, regardless of what Congress does.

Chicago needs clean water. Ours has brain-damaging lead, as I'm sure you're aware. Lake Michigan water becomes contaminated after it leaves the city's treatment plants and passes through lead service lines and internal plumbing. Individual property owners are responsible for maintaining service lines under the city's plumbing code. Guess which residents can't afford that?

Other cities — Milwaukee, Boston, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Denver, St. Paul — are footing the bill to replace the lead water pipes that connect homes to street water sources.

As my colleague Michael Hawthorne has reported, lead robs the brain of the gray matter that allows people to pay attention, regulate emotions and control impulses. Numerous studies have linked childhood exposure to violent crime.

Our sewer system is old and incapable of containing the amount of rain water we've gotten this spring. Thousands of homes in Chicago have been flooded, often with raw sewage. That's going to get worse as climate change leads to more heavy precipitation and hurricanes.

Chicago is slowly sinking — 1 or 2 millimeters a year, according to scientists. Our lakefront will be about 4 inches higher in the next century, according to this report by my colleague Tony Briscoe, which will redefine flood plains and further strain sewer pipes.

Chicago needs jobs. Forty-seven percent of 20- to 24-year-old black men in Chicago were out of school and out of work in 2014, according to a 2016 report from the University of Illinois at Chicago's Great Cities Institute. The report showed the highest concentration of youth unemployment on the city's South and West sides.

Our recycling program is a joke.

A Green New Deal could help all of the above.

From the resolution introduced by Ocasio-Cortez and Markey:

"Climate change, pollution and environmental destruction have exacerbated systematic racial, regional, social, environmental and economic injustices by disproportionately affecting indigenous peoples, communities of color, migrant communities, deindustrialized communities, depopulated rural communities, the poor, low-income workers, women, the elderly, the unhoused, people with disabilities and youth."

Clean, affordable, accessible public transit, upgrading buildings to achieve maximum energy efficiency, upgrading infrastructure, building resiliency against climate change-related disasters, guaranteeing universal access to clean water, directing investments to spur economic development and create high-quality jobs that pay prevailing wages and offer training and advancement opportunities — it's all in there.

Chicago is going to be a much easier sell than Congress. Our City Council has six socialists. Democrats occupy pretty much every elected office. Plus, you won every ward. You have the closest thing to a mandate Chicago offers a person.

A Green New Deal could also energize the youth vote, something you did not capture in April.

I know you've got a lot of priorities: Public safety. Schools. Neighborhood redevelopment. A pension crisis. It's a daunting load.

A Green New Deal wouldn't solve all of it, but it would provide a framework to address a good chunk. And it would do so with an eye toward the city's and its residents' futures, not just your political fortunes. Your predecessors, particularly the previous two, have not been great at that.

This could change Chicago's narrative. It could change Chicago's future. It could change Chicago's livability for all residents, not just those with enough money to buffer themselves from this city's harshest realities. It could lead the way for other cities to follow.

What do you say?

Officers from the state health department were at Christ Medical Center in Oak Lawn on Tuesday.

Hospital that took in slain teen's baby probed

Oak Lawn site may have waited 2 weeks to alert authorities

By Elyssa Cherney and Lisa Schencker
Chicago Tribune

The Illinois Department of Public Health is investigating a south suburban hospital that waited two weeks before alerting authorities about a newborn who arrived in the emergency room on life support and accompanied by a woman who falsely claimed to be the mother.

The department would not disclose details of its investigation of Advocate Christ Medical Center in Oak Lawn, the latest twist in the horrific case of a pregnant teen who was strangled and her baby boy cut from her womb.

The baby arrived at the hospital by ambulance on April 23 along with a woman who said she had just given birth at her Southwest Side home. But an examination found no evidence of that. Even so, the hospital did not notify the state Department of Children and Family Services until May 9, two days after police contacted the hospital about the case.

In the next week, police would determine the woman had strangled 19-year-old Marlen Ochoa-Lopez and removed the baby. The woman, her boyfriend and her daughter have been charged.

State law requires doctors, nurses and others who work at hospitals to report to DCFS suspected child abuse or neglect. Doctors who "willfully" fail to report can face consequences from the Illinois State Medical Disciplinary Board while other mandated reporters can be charged with a misdemeanor.

Officers from the state health department were at Christ Medical Center on Tuesday afternoon. Department spokeswoman Melaney Arnold said site inspections are unannounced. Investigators may review facility policies and procedures, medical charts and other records, she said. They may also talk with staff, patients and physicians.

The investigation comes a day after the Cook County sheriff's office raised questions about whether the hospital should have notified DCFS sooner.

"We will ask DCFS to advise if this unspeakably tragic set of facts was reportable by a mandated reporter," Cara Smith, chief policy officer for the sheriff's office, said in a statement Monday evening. "If they determine it was, we will ensure it is immediately investigated."

FAMILY PHOTO

Baby Yovani's mother Marlen Ochoa-Lopez was killed and left on Chicago's Southwest Side.

DCFS confirmed it is working with the sheriff's office "to determine whether mandated reporting laws were followed," agency spokesman Jassen Strokosch said in a statement.

Experts in the field have also questioned the actions of the hospital, which so far has refused to comment, citing patient privacy. Some say this is a case where the hospital clearly should have called child protective services immediately.

"This child is at risk of being abused or neglected if he or she is in the possession of someone who is making misrepresentations about their relationship to the child," said Kent Dean, an attorney in Oak Park who typically represents parents under investigation by DCFS. "That should have been an automatic call."

Dean said that as a psychiatric worker in a hospital years ago, he called child protective services several times to report possible abuse or neglect. He called the hospital's failure to immediately report the situation "baffling."

Others, however, say it may not have seemed as clear-cut to the hospital.

"It's a tricky one, actually," said Diane Redleaf, founder and former executive director of the Family Defense Center. "The fact that she wasn't really the mother makes the child a dependent child, but not necessarily an abused or a neglected child."

Still, she said, the question of whether the hospital was legally required to call authorities is different from the question of whether calling authorities would have been the right thing to do.

"It is very strange and troubling that they didn't do it," she said in an email.

Ochoa-Lopez was expecting her second child, due in a matter of weeks, when she logged into a moms group on Facebook and made contact with a woman who would later be charged with killing her. In a post on April 22, the teen said she needed a double stroller and some baby clothes.

She got an answer from Clarisa Figueroa, 46, who asked Ochoa-Lopez to come to her home in the 4100 block of West 77th Place the next day. Police and prosecutors said Figueroa and her daughter, Desiree Figueroa, strangled the teen and the elder Figueroa cut the near-full-term baby from her body.

The baby had problems breathing, and the elder Figueroa called 911. Paramedics took her and the baby to Christ Medical Center, where the boy was placed on life support and Figueroa was examined after claiming to be the mother.

"While at the labor and delivery section at Christ, (Figueroa) was examined but showed no signs consistent with a woman who had just delivered a baby," prosecutors said last week in charging Figueroa, her daughter and the elder woman's boyfriend.

Figueroa "did have blood on her arms, hands and across her face, which was from the murder of (Ochoa-Lopez) and the removal of (her) baby," they added. "The blood was cleaned off by an OB technician."

It's unclear whether Figueroa was allowed to visit the baby in intensive care in the following days. According to prosecutors, Figueroa created a GoFundMe page asking for donations for the baby and featuring a picture of the boy hooked up to a breathing tube and monitors. The page eventually was taken down, but it's not known when.

The hospital did not contact state child welfare officials until more than two weeks later, on May 9, days after police showed up at Christ asking about the baby, according to police and DCFS. Chicago police say they never heard from the hospital either and only went there May 7 after getting a tip about the baby, who remained in the intensive care unit hooked up to life support.

A spokesman for the hospital declined to comment on why the hospital waited to contact authorities, citing "patient privacy" and referring questions to local law enforcement, saying "this is an ongoing police matter."

Once DCFS was contacted, the boy was placed into protective state custody, according to DCFS' Strokosch. Custody eventually turned over May 13 to the boy's father, 20-year-old Yovani Lopez, who was married to Marlen Ochoa-Lopez and also is the father of their 3-year-old son.

Prosecutors seek 17-year prison term for Mexican cartel leader

His long-awaited testimony helped convict 'El Chapo'

By Jason Meisner

EDUARDO VERDUGO/AP

Military officers escort Vicente Zambada-Niebla on March 19, 2009, in Mexico City.

Four months ago, Vicente Zambada-Niebla's long-awaited testimony in New York helped convict Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman of drug conspiracy charges that could keep the notorious Sinaloa cartel kingpin in prison for life.

Now, nearly a decade after he made the stunning decision to leave the cartel, Zambada-Niebla is in line to reap a substantial reward for his "unrivaled" cooperation with federal investigators.

In a court filing late Monday, federal prosecutors in Chicago asked a judge to sentence Zambada-Niebla, a former top aide to Guzman and the son of the cartel's current boss, to just 17 years in prison on charges of trafficking thousands of pounds of cocaine and heroin into the U.S. using speedboats, submarines and jumbo jets.

Zambada-Niebla, who faces up to life in prison, could be released in as little as four years — with credit for time he's already served in custody — if U.S. District Chief Judge Ruben Castillo went along with the recommendation by the U.S. attorney's office.

The sentencing is set for May 30.

In their 23-page filing, prosecutors said the information and testimony provided over the years by Zambada-Niebla disrupted a major pipeline of illegal drugs flowing into the U.S. and helped lead to the convictions of dozens of cartel members — including Guzman himself. Prosecutors described him as a "model" cooperator, sitting for more than 100 debriefings over the years and detailing his firsthand knowledge of the inner workings of the narco world.

Unlike other cartel figures who offered cooperation only at late stages in criminal proceedings, Zambada-Niebla already had tried to leave the family business behind several times before he finally agreed to cooperate in 2009, prosecutors said.

"When the defendant stopped, he stopped," Assistant U.S. Attorneys Christopher Hotaling and Erika Csicsila wrote. "He appears to have done so for the right reasons. And he has done everything asked of him by the government, even when his cooperation came at a great personal cost."

Although he'll continue to be in witness protection when he's released, Zambada-Niebla probably will be looking over his shoulder for the rest of his life, prosecutors said.

"(Zambada-Niebla) is one of the most well-known cooperating witnesses in the world, and he and his family will live the rest of their lives in danger of being killed in retribution," prosecutors wrote.

Zambada-Niebla, 44, known as "Mayito" after his father, Ismael "El Mayo" Zambada, admitted in two plea agreements with prosecutors that he helped oversee Guzman's vast narcotics operation, including the cartel's use of "military-caliber" weapons to enforce their shipments as well as "violence and threats of violence" to rivals, informants and law enforcement.

In January, Zambada-Niebla told jurors during Guzman's trial in New York that he had once ordered the kidnapping, torture and slaying of a rival drug dealer at the behest of his bosses. He also testified that his father often paid as much as $1 million a month to bribe Mexican officials and described how one army general was given a $50,000 monthly stipend by the cartel.

As part of the two plea deals he cut with the government, Zambada-Neibla has agreed not to fight an unprecedented order to forfeit $1.37 billion in ill-gotten proceeds from the cartel.

The bombshell news that Zambada-Niebla was cooperating did not become public until 2014, more than a year after he secretly pleaded guilty in a locked Chicago federal courtroom.

Zambada-Niebla was arrested in 2009 in Mexico City and extradited to Chicago a year later. After his arrival, authorities at the Metropolitan Correctional Center in the Loop refused to let him exercise on the rooftop, citing concern over an assassination attempt or escape by helicopter. Zambada-Niebla was later moved to a Michigan facility, and for years he appeared in court in Chicago only via teleconference.

After his guilty plea in the Chicago case, he was secretly moved to an undisclosed location, authorities said. The U.S. Bureau of Prisons website has no record of his whereabouts.

At the center of the charges against Zambada-Niebla are Pedro and Margarito Flores, twin brothers from Chicago's West Side who had risen in the ranks of Guzman's organization before providing key cooperation. In October 2008, Margarito Flores attended a meeting with Zambada-Niebla, Guzman and other cartel leaders at a mountaintop compound in Mexico, the charges allege.

Flores told authorities that Guzman discussed a plot to attack a U.S. or Mexican government or media building in retaliation for the recent arrest of an associate. In that same conversation, Zambada-Niebla turned to Flores and asked him to find somebody who could give him "big, powerful weapons" to help carry out the attack, according to court records.

"We don't want Middle Eastern or Asian guns, we want big U.S. guns or RPGs (rocket-propelled grenades)," said Zambada-Niebla, according to Flores' account of the talk in court records. "We don't need one, we need a lot of them."

Court records show Flores later secretly recorded a telephone conversation with Zambada-Niebla, telling him the weapons were going to cost twice as much as they had thought.

"That's fine, just let me know," Zambada-Niebla replied, according to court records.

The Flores twins were each sentenced by Castillo to 14 years in prison in 2015. Pedro Flores also testified at Guzman's trial in New York in December.

Zambada-Niebla's father, meanwhile, remains a fugitive, believed to be hiding in the Mexican mountains where the family got its start as ranchers.

Emanuel has a new gig: 'Contributing editor' at The Atlantic

By Lisa Donovan
Chicago Tribune

Less than 24 hours after leaving office, former Chicago Mayor Rahm Emanuel has landed a new gig — in journalism.

The Atlantic, where Emanuel has written a dozen essays in recent months, has made him a "contributing editor," the national magazine announced in a statement Tuesday.

"The Atlantic will be the primary home for Emanuel's writing, with the former mayor contributing frequent essays to The Atlantic's Ideas section," Anna Bross, a magazine spokeswoman, said in an emailed statement.

His latest, titled "It's Time to Hold American Elites Accountable for Their Abuses," was posted early Tuesday.

In the essay, Emanuel, whose critics around Chicago often called him "Mayor 1 Percent," said the national college admissions scandal has added fuel to an ongoing middle-class revolt against the "elites" that has larger political implications for the 2020 election. "This middle-class revolt is the most important barrier standing between Democrats and the White House," he wrote.

He went on: "Think of what's happened over the past decade and a half. America endured a war sold on false premises, a bailout of bankers issuing entirely toxic debt, and a massive public effort to prop up auto executives who were building cars that weren't selling. Is it any wonder so many middle-class taxpayers resent the elites?"

Emanuel acknowledged in the piece that he was White House chief of staff under former President Barack Obama, who in the early days of his administration pushed through an $80 billion bailout of the American auto industry.

Emanuel, a frequent media critic who liked to mix it up with local reporters, decided not to run for a third term. He wrapped up his eight years in office Monday, when Lori Lightfoot took the reins as Chicago mayor.

*If you believe your only options are agonizing knee pain or surgery... You are WRONG!

Thousands of Chicagoland Boomers and Seniors are now getting knee pain RELIEF, INSTEAD of knee replacement.

It turns out, the secret of enjoying the "golden years" is NOT simply having a giant nest egg for retirement Why?

Recent research showed that Baby Boomers and seniors who lead an active lifestyle during retirement, and continue doing the things they truly enjoy, free of pain, ARE happier, regardless of income level or wealth.

And truth be told, people who don't have their mobility to enjoy their favorite activities at that age, all the money in the world won't bring true happiness.

We know this because we hear people say this over and over again at the Joint Relief Institute in Orland Park. Comments like this . . .

"I didn't know how much LIFE and SLEEP I was missing because of my knee pain, until it went away with this wonderful treatment."

— George R.

You know how it is . . .

You start to recognize your knee is hurting, and you try pain medicines, braces, or different over-the-counter arthritis supplements. Soon enough, you realize they either cause lots of side effects, or they fail to live up to their promise of fast, long-lasting relief, and are not worth the price of the bottle they come in.

And BECAUSE you'd prefer NOT to go under the knife . . .

And can't afford to be put in bed for several weeks, and because you know people who still hurt EVEN after surgery . . . you give up, and learn to live with the pain. BUT, you miss out on things you enjoy doing, and lose your golden years one activity at a time.

With less activity, comes weight gain, and depression . . . Yes, you can put up with this ache in your knee, but the cost of doing nothing about it is HUGE. You are not doing yourself a favor by "toughing it out."

"Six months later, I found out the one thing between me and losing 20 lbs, WAS my knee pain"

— Mary T.

"Every day was hard. I couldn't enjoy my favorite activities anymore. But thankfully, now I'm back in full form. I am doing yard work for the first time in years!"

— Phil M.

What are my options if I don't want to undergo surgery?

Today we live in an age with tremendous technology advances, and that's what Joint Relief Institute doctors use to put new life and energy into failing knee joints.

Using precise, advanced imaging, they gently place an all natural joint lubricant directly inside your knee to replace the lost fluid that's causing your pain. This treatment has proven to have a very high rate of success.

However, it HAS to be done right with advanced imaging . . .

A recent study examined trained

Advanced Digital technology is used to eliminate a HUGE percentage of treatment failures. Every treatment at Joint Relief Institute is pin-pointed to the damaged area inside the knee. The doctors see the medication live as it goes to help the troubled joint.

doctors and surgeons who attempted these injections without using advanced imaging. Instead, they simply felt the knee with their fingers and BLINDLY delivered the replacement fluid.

The study revealed that these doctors missed the target most of the time . . . In fact, 30% of the time, they didn't even place the treatment inside the joint. Yes THIRTY percent. It is not a typo.

Alternative to the knife for your knee pain? Non-Surgical treatment success rate soars after using new digital technology

Even after missing the target, they had no way of knowing they missed, because they are not SEEING it with advanced imaging.

That means these patients went away thinking they had received a life-changing treatment, and, in fact, did not get any benefit at all. Even worse, many of them went on to have surgery they didn't need.

How did Joint Relief Institute find the Antidote to this MISERABLE failure . . .

The doctors at the Joint Relief Institute are trained in using cutting-edge low dose motion digital imaging. These highly skilled, Board Certified doctors are able to see into the knee joint. They actually watch the medicine, live, as it goes where it needs to be. This technology is so precise, so advanced, and so forefront that it was able to make a whole difference in Non-surgical treatments.

"We've had so many patients tell us they RECEIVED treatments like Synvisc or Orthovisc in the past, and it didn't work. So they were considering surgery, and some even had surgery scheduled. Luckily, we were able to save many of those people from the knife." Said Dr Mike Hana at the Joint Relief Institute.

Joint Relief Institute's proven accuracy and effective treatment is why people are traveling hundreds of miles to get knee pain treatment from their Doctors.

Why did Knee treatments from Joint Relief Institute become the talk of the town?

Many seniors walk out feeling better than they have in years! So as you might imagine, when their friends see them move easier, walk further, sleep better and are happier, they want it also.

Only days after this treatment, people usually notice a decrease in: Pain... Stiffness...Muscle weakness... Swelling... Locked joints... Reduced range of motion... and Cracking sounds.

Most patients who receive the treatment are able to live pain free for up to 6 months, and some even get relief for 3-5 years with NO additional treatments.

How does the treatment help relieve your joint pain...

It's pretty simple, really. You see, when you're young, you have a thick, fluid protein inside your knee joints to lubricate them as you move.

This fluid also acts as a cushion and shock absorber inside your knee. It's called synovial fluid, and it works much like the oil in a car's engine to keep all the parts moving freely, without friction.

However, as you age, this fluid dries out, leaving your bones to painfully rub and grind against each other with every step. And unfortunately, there's no way for the joint to make more.

After years of trusted service in moving you everywhere you need to go, you start to feel a subtle ache in your knees with certain activities like kneeling down, or getting out of the car. With time, it becomes a constant ache. If left untreated, it can keep you awake at night, and hurt with every step.

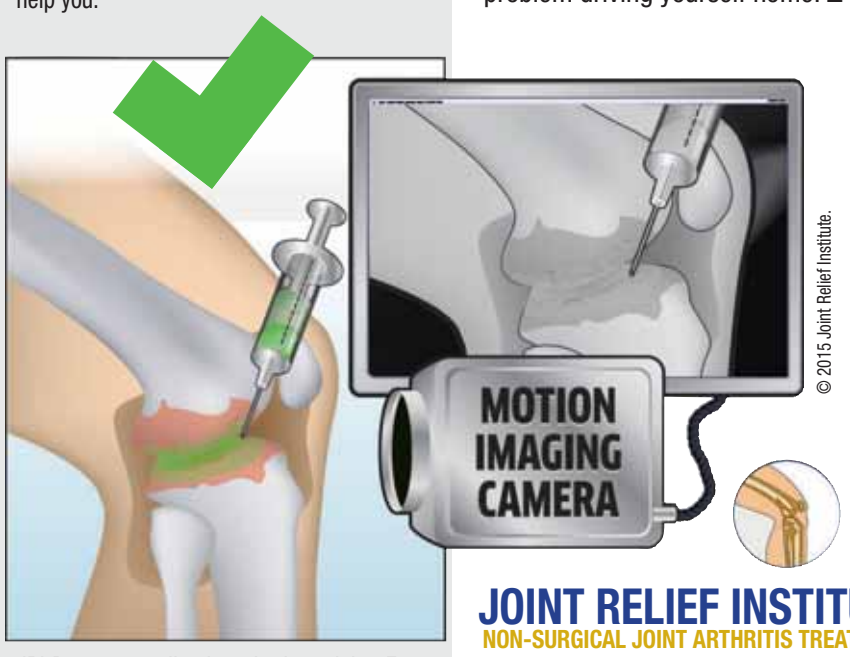
The good news is, researchers discovered an almost identical, all natural lubricating fluid called Hyaluronic acid. It has been proven in numerous clinical studies to act as a natural lubricant in your joints.

It's FDA approved and is a perfect cushion and shock absorber for your joints. Once it's correctly placed inside your knee, it can make them feel just like new again, eliminate any rubbing and friction, and make your joints glide smoothly.

Are there any side effects to this treatment? Is the treatment painful?

After numbing the skin with a special spray, Joint Relief's imaging technology makes this treatment virtually painless. And because you are getting a supplement for a protein we are all born having, there are NO known after effects.

If you received this kind of treatment in the past, and it didn't relieve your pain, there is a BIG chance the medication landed somewhere around, but not INSIDE, the joint where it can't help you.



JRI Doctors see live into the knee joint. Even you will be able to tell the medicine went where it needs to be. No guess work, no poking around, the medicine cushion lubricate and help heal the damaged knee.

That is right, this is a quick, natural long-lasting, non-invasive, non-surgical treatment with NO known side effects...

Is it true this natural treatment costs NOTHING?...

Yes, more good news, besides the pain relief, is that because this non-surgical program has already proven to help thousands of seniors, Medicare and other insurance plans DO cover the full cost of the treatment.

So there is very likely NO COST to you for this life-changing treatment.

Here is what you need to do if you or a loved one is suffering with knee pain…

Call now for a free screening...

If you or a loved one is suffering with knee pain, this could be the blessed relief you're looking for. You are personally invited to a FREE knee pain screening from the Joint Relief Institute doctors to see if you are a good candidate for this all-natural, highly-precise treatment.

Due to high demand, they can only offer a limited number of FREE screens every month. So if you're interested, Call now (708) 963-0064.

Waiting will not help you feel better...

This ache in your knees could be a sign of serious damage and people who choose to simply "tough it out" will definitely see their knees deteriorate further over time. The one thing we know is: The damage will NEVER undo itself without some help.

Your screening will only take about 20-30 minutes of your time, as one of their doctors sits down with you and answers all the questions you have about your knees.

On the day of your treatment, you'll be able to come in on your own, and be done within 30 minutes or less. No pain. No problem driving yourself home. ■

THE LEGACY OF FLIGHT 191

Fatal crash fueled air safety reforms

flames. Bodies were burned beyond recognition.

Forty years later, the crash of Flight 191 remains the deadliest passenger airline accident on U.S. soil.

Its legacy helped spur reforms that contributed to a vast improvement in commercial aviation safety.

"It had a lasting impact on how aircraft maintenance is overseen," said former Federal Aviation Administration chief of staff Michael Goldfarb. "It was just a stark reminder those things are very important."

The changes didn't happen overnight. A series of air disasters in the decade and a half that followed, coupled with rising demand for air travel that put more passengers on more airplanes each day, forced the industry to reckon with its safety record, aviation safety experts said.

It worked. With improvements in technology, training and systems meant to flag problems before they lead to accidents, it's been more than a decade since the last fatal crash on a scheduled passenger flight by a U.S. airline.

But two months ago, weeks after that 10-year milestone was achieved, the industry faced another crisis. The second fatal crash of a Boeing 737 Max overseas within less than six months led to a global grounding of the plane — one of the only times regulators grounded an entire fleet since Flight 191 crashed in Chicago. As investigations into those two accidents continue, regulators and industry officials worldwide are conducting a reassessment of safety procedures.

To some, the crashes of the 737 Max served as a necessary caution against complacency.

Ralph Nader, the consumer advocate whose niece died in the March 10 Max crash in Ethiopia, likened the industry's approach to safety to a rubber band that has been repeatedly stretched without breaking.

"You get complacent about how much you can stretch it, and it snaps," he said.

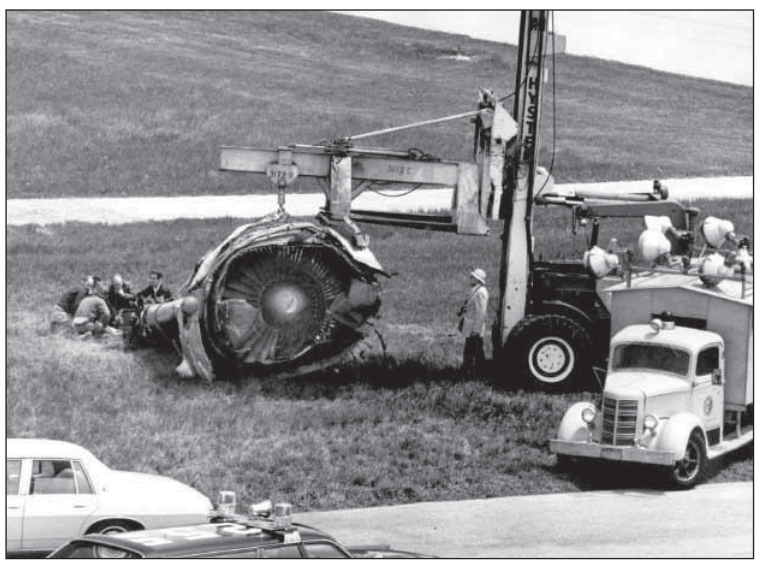
Firefighters and rescue teams find the remains of victims amid the smoldering debris from American Airlines Flight 191 accident at O'Hare in 1979.



KAREN ENGSTROM/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

The DC-10 engine can be seen on the grass just east of Runway 32 right where it stopped after falling from Flight 191 before the plane crashed.

The crash

Dan Cirignani, a police officer patrolling the airport roads on foot that afternoon, didn't see the plane go down. But it was impossible to miss the black smoke clouding the sky over the airport. He wondered if it was a drill.

But a voice on his radio called all personnel to a "strike on the field" — a plane crash. Then he heard the sirens.

Firefighters from Elk Grove Village, which borders O'Hare, were on the scene in four minutes. They'd been told a plane had crashed. But the smoke was so thick that Bill Clark, a lieutenant at the time, said he couldn't be certain until he sliced through a fence and saw the deep furrow the aircraft made in the ground, along with debris and victims.

It was obvious that no one on board could have survived, he said.

"It was total devastation. There was nothing we could do to change what happened," said Clark, now Schaumburg's emergency management coordinator.

In addition to the passengers and crew, two people on the ground were killed and two more suffered second- and third-degree burns when hit by burning jet fuel, Clark said. An old aircraft hangar, several cars and a mobile home were also destroyed.

Cirignani, 76, who retired in 2005 and now lives in Barrington, had worked fires and crashes before. But the first time he saw one of the victims, he didn't immediately recognize it as a body.

"I had to ask the pathologist," he said. "They looked like black coal."

For a while, he refused to light a grill, and remains cautious when it comes to anything to do with fire.

"The carnage, it was just one of the most horrible things you've ever seen," he said.

The intensity of the blaze and number of people on board made identifying victims unusually hard, said Edward Pavlik, an orthodontist and chief of forensic sciences for the Cook County sheriff's office, who was part of a team of forensic dentists that worked to ID Flight 191 victims.

High-pressure hoses used on the blaze left a crater in the ground filled with "a tangled mess," said Pavlik, 76, of Homer Glen.

Several of the victims had been headed to the American Booksellers Association convention in Los Angeles, including local author Judith Wax and her husband, Playboy Magazine Managing Editor Sheldon Wax. Other travelers came from as far away as Australia, Austria, Belgium and the Netherlands.

The wreckage was too badly damaged to give investigators much useful information, except for the engine that broke away from the wing before impact..

It would provide important answers to both questions facing investigators: Why had the engine and structure attaching it to the wing broken off? And why had pilots lost control of a plane that, though badly damaged, was designed to fly if an engine failed?

The investigation

Within days of the crash, the Federal Aviation Administration ordered other carriers to inspect their DC-10s, focusing on where the engine attaches to the wing.

Ernie Gigliotti was one of the night shift mechanics United Airlines tapped at O'Hare. As he did the inspection, "I just had the feeling there was something not right," said Gigliotti, 71, who retired in 2002 and lives in Pittsburgh. He pushed on the engine nose and felt it move side to side rather than up and down, and heard an unusual metallic noise. He and his partner removed more panels and found obvious damage: fractures, and bolts with the heads sheared off.

> "That's the battle you constantly fight in safety; it's safety versus money."
> — Anthony Brickhouse, associate professor of aerospace and occupational safety at Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University

When American and Continental Airlines also found damage to their DC-10s during the ordered inspections, the FAA grounded the DC-10 fleet on June 6, a dozen days after the crash.

The National Transportation Safety Board traced Flight 191's damage to American's decision to ignore McDonnell Douglas' instructions during a maintenance procedure that required removing the engine and the pylon connecting it to the wing.

The DC-10's manual instructed workers to take off the heavier engine before detaching the pylon. But removing the engine and pylon as a unit saved about 200 man-hours per aircraft, according to the NTSB.

"That equals money," said Anthony Brickhouse, associate professor of aerospace and occupational safety at Embry-Riddle Aeronautical University. "And that's the battle you constantly fight in safety; it's safety versus money."

American also decided to use a forklift, which wasn't precise enough to remove and reattach the engine without risking damage, the NTSB said.

But if damage during a maintenance check at American's facility in Tulsa, Okla., two months earlier explained why the engine came off, it didn't fully explain why pilots lost control.

According to the NTSB, hydraulic lines that powered other critical systems were severed when the engine and pylon broke away, leaving the aircraft unusually vulnerable to a stall and disabling warning systems.

The NTSB said it wasn't reasonable to expect Flight 191's captain, Walter Lux, and first officer, James Dillard, to have recognized what was wrong in time to prevent a crash.

The aftermath

The fallout from the accident was a call to action for an industry and its regulators.

The FAA slapped American and Continental with fines of $500,000 and $100,000, respectively, for improper maintenance.

Airlines were ordered to inspect their DC-10s for damage and stick to the Douglas-endorsed maintenance procedure. The FAA ordered improvements to the DC-10's warning systems and revised flight manual procedures for handling an engine failure.

In addition, an Illinois law now encourages dentures be marked with information identifying the wearer. Pavlik, the forensic dentist, said he pushed the measure after realizing it could have helped verify victims' identities.

The NTSB also called for broader changes, such as better tracking and reporting of maintenance-related damage, stricter oversight of maintenance and tougher vetting when airlines sought to deviate from manufacturer-endorsed methods.

Both airlines and regulators missed opportunities to spot the risks before the Flight 191 crash, either by better vetting the hazards of using the forklift or spotting red flags, the NTSB said in the report. Continental, for example, twice caught and repaired damage similar to that on Flight 191 before the crash, but American told the safety board that it wasn't aware other airlines had experienced problems.

The FAA declined to act on some of those recommendations at the time, arguing that existing regulations already went far enough or that the changes wouldn't improve safety enough to justify the extra cost.

But there were changes, said Robert Swaim, national resource specialist with the NTSB, who has investigated accidents including the Trans World Airlines 800 crash that killed 230 in 1996.

"We had this accident (Flight 191), and continued to have a number of accidents ... and the FAA kind of came around after we investigated and reiterated some points, that we really do have to do this stuff," he said.

In a statement, American said it actively works with federal regulators and its industry officials to improve air safety.

"We honor our customers, crew members and those on the ground whose lives were lost, and our hearts go out to those personally affected by the tragedy of Flight 191," the airline said. United Airlines also said it continually works to improve safety.

The reforms

Fatal crashes continued in the years that followed. All the while, demand for travel was growing, meaning more passengers, more flights — and more crashes, Swaim said.

"The major power players basically came to the same realization that we can't keep going like we are," he said.

Advancements in technology helped. Engines grew more reliable and airlines adopted systems that warned pilots if they were in danger of colliding with another aircraft or flying into the ground or an obstacle, said Hassan Shahidi, CEO of the Flight Safety Foundation.

Other changes targeted human errors, including improvements in training and rules barring casual conversation in the cockpit below a certain altitude.

Swaim also pointed to a change in how the industry thought about accidents and collected data: Instead of focusing solely on an individual incident, officials tried to identify patterns pointing to reforms that could have broader benefits. Over the years, airlines, manufacturers and regulators have worked to improve the wahow they gather, share and analyze data to try to spot red flags before they lead to accidents, Shahidi said.

As a result, the last time a scheduled passenger flight on a U.S. commercial airline ended in a fatal crash was outside Buffalo, N.Y., in 2009. All 49 people on board were killed, along with one person on the ground.

To be sure, U.S. air travel hasn't been without incident: There have been fatal accidents involving smaller aircraft or foreign carriers in recent years.

Boeing 737 Max

Then came the two fatal crashes of the Boeing 737 Max. Boeing has acknowledged a system was erroneously activated on both flights and said Thursday it has updated its flight-control software.

It's not clear whether that fix would have prevented either accident. But some have questioned whether more direct oversight by federal regulators could have identified problems before the Lion Air and Ethiopian Airlines accidents. In the years leading up to the crash, federal regulators have ceded greater authority to manufacturers like Boeing to certify the safety of their own planes.

The system generally works despite the apparent conflict of interest, said Shawn Pruchnicki, who teaches aviation safety at Ohio State University. "It's a little bit like having the fox guard the henhouse because there's so much self-policing, but they have the same interests as everyone else. They don't want the aircraft to crash either," he said.

The FAA disputed the idea that companies were allowed to police themselves, saying it exerts "strict" oversight and is directly involved in testing and approving new features and technologies. In the case of the Max's certification, FAA safety engineers and test pilots put in 110,000 hours of work and flew or supported 297 test flights, the FAA said.

Still, the 737 Max situation raises questions about exactly how much latitude manufacturers should have and when changes are significant enough to require an outsider's view, Pruchnicki said.

"There needs to be a point at which we decide this isn't your father's 737 anymore," he said.

The NTSB has also pushed for stricter FAA oversight and urged the industry to be quicker to accept safety-enhancing regulations. But Swaim, who declined to comment on the 737 Max case due to the ongoing investigation, noted concerns about the industry's inertia and the extent to which the FAA delegates authority to the companies it regulates have been around for decades — even as safety improved.

"This has been going on for a long time, and for the thousands of flights that take off a day, that's pretty phenomenal," he said. "It cannot be luck."

But Goldfarb said the oversight handed over to airlines and manufacturers has grown and that he worries the industry's excellent record can undermine the case for costly but beneficial changes.

The odds of a crash grow so slim that there are "little things you overlook," he said. "They start to add up, and you're only as safe as your last flight."

There are few public reminders of the 1979 crash today. American no longer operates a Flight 191, and for more than three decades after the crash, there was no Chicago-area site honoring the victims. Creating one took a group of Chicago sixth graders, who led the push to build the memorial in Des Plaines after learning their assistant principal, Kim Jockl, lost her parents in the crash.

But there's no danger of Fight 191 being forgotten by those connected to the crash, or in the aviation community.

"Not a semester goes by that we don't talk about it," said Brickhouse, the Embry-Riddle professor.

"To me, it's one of the seminal moments."

Ellen Gemme is the daughter of Francis Gemme, a Winnetka publishing executive who boarded Flight 191 to attend the American Booksellers Association convention in Los Angeles. She had just turned 8, and remembers seeing her mother collapse upon learning that Francis had been on the plane. She is now a nurse who lives near Philadelphia.

As a child, it's a very confusing thing. One of the girls who was supposed to come to my birthday party, her mom came to the house and got me and took me and all of my friends and gave me a party. So I was not home for the official confirmation (of his death), for the reporters showing up at the house, for the relatives all arriving.

Francis Gemme

Even though I had seen my mother fall to the ground, I knew but I didn't know. How could you even fathom this? It was shocking. It was like having your entire world disappear in a moment.

The thing is, it wasn't just my dad who died that day. My family died too. That's really the bottom-line truth of it. The family that we were, the beautiful little independent nuclear family, was ruined. It was never the same.

All three of the kids were sent away almost immediately (to live with relatives or at summer camp), so none of us were with my mother for almost the first three months after my father died. It was a very different time. There was not really a sense that children grieved.

I'm a mother myself now. I have three children. All of my mothering is delivered through the lens of what happened. It affects everything. That doesn't mean I don't have joy, or that I'm not happy. My father would have been devastated if I didn't have a joyful life. But I make sure I write my kids letters before I get on an airplane.

My husband and I do not fly together. If we fly, we either fly as a family, or my husband and I fly separately. We are never on the same plane, ever, which I get is ridiculous, but it's sort of like an illusion of control. I can't imagine my children having to face the fear and the terror and the loneliness and sadness that I felt. When you experience the one-in-a-million thing — whatever the statistic is — that's never supposed to happen, it doesn't feel so remote.

I think it was an enormous tragedy that ultimately changed the way we fly in this country. One of the key recommendations from the (National Transportation Safety Board) report was that airlines are now required to consult with the manufacturer as they modify their procedures, and that has unquestionably made every flight that we get on safer. In that way, everyone who died was a hero. We now fly more safely because of this crash.

In terms of my dad, I think he was an amazing man and a wonderful father who in eight short years gave me more than I could have ever asked for. To this day, 40 years later, I remember the way he looked at me. I remember feeling loved. I remember him reading bedtime stories to me, and I remember a house filled with laughter. That's quite a legacy.

Michael Adduci

Michael Adduci is the brother of Kathleen Adduci, a nursing student from Homewood who was taking a vacation to Hawaii after calling off her wedding. He was 20 when the crash happened, and now lives in Camden, Mich., after retiring from Metra.

She was a very quiet, beautiful individual. She was a wonderful sister. She was going to nursing school, and I really remember how hard she was studying because it was so tough. She'd be up late at night all the time.

Kathleen Adduci

She was supposed to get married, and (her fiance) got a job out in California. When he went out there to start his life, I guess he kind of changed his views on the marriage. His excuse was that he just wanted to continue pursuing his work, so they basically had called it off.

She was quite upset. My mom said, "Why don't you forget about everything and use the money you had saved for the wedding and go to Hawaii with your two friends?"

We got out of work at 3:30 p.m. (the day of the crash), and as soon as I got in the car, I heard the news on the radio. I listened to it, but I guess you try to put it out of your mind.

When I got home, my two younger sisters were waiting for me. There was a girl who was supposed to have gone with my sister on the trip, and she backed out at the last minute. She called our house and said that was (Kathleen's) plane. That was a little hard to believe, so I called Lincoln Mall Travel, and the woman was in tears, saying that was her plane.

No parent wants to lose a child, so it affected my parents the most. My mom was in remission for breast cancer, and within three months of my sister's passing, her cancer came back and spread throughout her body. She died in 1981.

My father was never right after (Kathleen's death). It just affected him so terribly. He could never get over it.

There's so much you go through when you lose a family member in such a tragic accident. You go on with life, but they're always in the back of your mind, always. You always feel sorry for yourself because you lose a family member, but when I went to the memorial in 2011, it made me realize just how bad other people had it, when they lost five family members. It's hard to fathom.

It's still horrible. Whenever my family sits around and talks, we always get upset about it. One of us is always breaking down talking about it, because she was such a beautiful individual. She didn't deserve what happened to her.

You try to keep things they had to hold onto them. Her notes from school, and cards, and everything that was from the funeral and the wake. That's the last thing you have of them. You don't really want to get rid of it.

She was just very warm and beautiful. The people who knew her always mention that. I've seen people mention her name on the internet and say nice things about her, which makes me feel good. There were a lot of people at her wake. She made a strong, good impression on a lot of people.

Kevin Moncrieff

Kevin Moncrieff is the son of John "Jack" Moncrieff, an engineer for Bell Telephone who helped develop underground telecommunication cables and who was headed home to Sacramento, Calif., after a week of training in the Chicago area. Moncrieff was 7 when his father died and now works as a pilot for United Airlines, based out of O'Hare.

I remember him being gone quite a bit. My dad worked really hard, long hours. He was on the board of directors for the local credit union and was in a Scottish pipe and drum band. That took his time as well. But I do have memories of going on trips in a 1976 gold Chevy van that he was really proud of. And I also remember him coming home every day. I would scream "Daddy, daddy!" and run to the front door and give him a hug.

John "Jack" Moncrieff

I was probably in second grade. I came home from school on the bus, walked in the front door and there were five people in the family room with my mom. That's when she broke the news and said, "There's been an accident. It doesn't look like Dad's coming home."

It's definitely the hardest news I've ever had. I just remember putting my face in my mom's lap and crying.

When things started to improve for me, I got into cycling and ended up getting a cycling coach who was a great influence on my life. He was truly like a father figure. I ended up making the U.S. junior cycling team and traveled to the world championships in 1988 and 1989.

I thought I would make a career of it, but I just didn't get any good offers when I turned 18. Heading home from a race, I decided to stop by the local airport and inquire about getting a private pilot's license. I had a couple of introductory flight lessons that were a gift when I was 16. I wasn't considering changing careers, but three weeks in, I decided, "You know what? I think I want to do this."

Everybody asks about that, and the response I always have is if your parents were killed in an automobile accident, would you not drive a car? If they were killed on a bike, would you not ride a bike? Flying is not inherently dangerous. There aren't very many (crashes) anymore.

Every time I do training with engine failures, it kind of makes me think of my dad's accident a little bit, and it makes me proud they've made changes. A lot of things in airline safety came out of Flight 191. A lot of aircraft design, the way they program the software on the airspeed indicator.

I don't think about it on every takeoff or landing (at O'Hare), but if the first officer is flying and I'm maybe looking out the window, I might look down at where the airplane crashed. It's quite unusual, I think, for someone to become a pilot and be based where your father died in an accident, flying over it every week.

Kim Jockl and Melody Smith

Kim Jockl and Melody Smith are the daughters of Bill and Corrine Borchers, a North Side couple who were traveling to Hawaii for a vacation. Jockl and Smith, who were 23 and 32 at the time of the crash, later helped to create the memorial in Des Plaines.

JOCKL: I was living at home, and I left the day before (Flight 191) for Acapulco because I was graduating from Northeastern Illinois University. United was on strike, so flights kept getting canceled and moved. My parents ended up getting tickets through a travel agency, Tartan Travel.

My mom said, "There's been too many changes. I've got a bad feeling about this." And we were like, "Go! It's going to be great."

SMITH: My husband stopped in a grocery store and heard on the TV that there was a crash. When we walked in our house, the phone was ringing. It was my mother-in-law asking what time my parents got on the flight. I didn't think it was American Airlines. The last I heard, it was Braniff. I called the airline, and they just took my name.

Then I remembered Tartan Travel. I got hold of someone walking out the door. He called me about five minutes later and said, yes, they were scheduled for that flight.

That night, I called my sister.

JOCKL: I kept thinking that they got it all wrong: "This is all going to be OK." Obviously it wasn't OK.

SMITH: We had solid relationships with our parents, and we were a very close-knit family that shared all the red-letter days. It impacted us because it was hard to have those days without them. It took a long time for us to be comfortable forging ahead with our own traditions, because Mom and Dad had such a predominant role.

I now tell my children the importance of them developing their relationship without me and my husband, because I realize the importance of those bonds.

JOCKL: At the time of the crash, it all just went away. There was a little service at St. Paul of the Cross, and life went back to normal, as normal as can be for people who were working at the airport and all the first responders who spent weeks on that field trying to identify people.

SMITH: When you lose 273 people at one time, there certainly should be a marker. When I get to that wall, that's where my parents are, because they died with all those people. You feel that. And certainly, the people we have met out there since the wall has been built, it is truly amazing what all of these people have suffered.

JOCKL: We've been very fortunate. We have healed. But I have to tell you, when we dedicated the wall, a woman drove there and still was holding a picture of her daughter in her wallet from the day of the crash. Her healing began that day, when finally she saw her daughter's name and met other people who could hug her and talk to her.

Joyous occasions and tragedies connect people. I'm hoping the 40th will be a joyous occasion so we can honor everyone who was connected with American Airlines Flight 191.

TECHNOLOGY FIELD TEST

During this limited time event, we are looking for people like you, who may be experiencing varying levels of hearing loss, to evaluate a brand new line of hearing aids designed especially to reduce listening effort in noisy environments, communicate ear-to-ear, and even connect wirelessly to your TV, stereo, or computer.

QUALIFIED PARTICIPANTS WILL RECEIVE:

1. FREE hearing screening including:

- VIDEO OTOSCOPY
  A video inspection of your ear canal. Your problem may just be wax.
- BASELINE SCREENING
  Find out which pitches and tones you are hearing and which you are missing and how that impacts your ability to understand words.
- SPEECH UNDERSTANDING ASSESSMENT
  See how well you are hearing and understanding conversations.
- FAMILIAR VOICE TEST
  Let's make sure you can understand the voices most important to you. Bring a loved one to your appointment so we can check your hearing and understanding of his or her voice.

2. FREE in-office demonstration

3. 30-day field evaluation

Test this Breakthrough Wireless Device

Our newest Receiver-In-Canal (RIC) hearing aids are designed to make listening both easier and more enjoyable. They can connect wirelessly via Bluetooth® to your TV, radio, or computer, and stream stereo sound directly into your ears at an amplification level tailor-made for you. And with wireless ear-to-ear communication, your hearing aids are engineered to communicate and coordinate with each other, enhancing your listening quality and eliminating the need to adjust each device manually. These instruments also include the most advanced feedback (buzzing and whistling) elimination, noise reduction, and speech preservation systems, and are resistant to water, humidity, perspiration, and corrosion—inside and out.

Lightfoot's security to be headed by ex-U.S. marshal

Man running the detail married to lobbyist for United

By John Byrne
Chicago Tribune

New Mayor Lori Lightfoot's security detail will be headed up by a former U.S. marshal who's married to a city lobbyist for United Airlines, in a departure from Chicago mayors traditionally relying on city police officers to keep them safe.

James Smith is a managing partner at Silver Star Protection Group. His wife is Margaret Houlihan-Smith, the onetime managing director of corporate and government affairs for United. Houlihan-Smith now lobbies the city on behalf of United and AT&T, according to city records.

Lightfoot's administration will look to Smith to coordinate her security rather than relying primarily on the Chicago Police Department. It was unclear Tuesday how Smith would be paid.

Lightfoot spokeswoman Anel Ruiz confirmed that Smith was working for Lightfoot in that security capacity. She did not respond to questions about whether it's appropriate for the person running the mayor's security detail to be married to a corporate lobbyist. Lightfoot campaigned on a pledge to end the influence of political insiders at City Hall.

Smith is a former corrections officer at Cook County Jail who then served for 26 years as a U.S. marshal, according to his biography on the Silver Star Protection website. Smith could not be reached for comment.

Reached by phone Tuesday, Houlihan-Smith declined to comment on the steps she and her husband plan to take to keep his security work for the mayor and her lobbying at City Hall separate.

Houlihan-Smith lobbied aldermen this year for United for clarification language in a workforce ordinance, according to city lobbying records.

She was in the spotlight in 2017 when, in her role at United, she joined other United officials at a City Council hearing probing whether Chicago aviation police officers who dragged a United Airlines passenger from a plane at O'Hare International Airport had the authority to do so, an incident that drew international attention.

Houlihan-Smith and her husband accompanied Mayor Rahm Emanuel to Rome in 2016 as part of a large Chicago group including several top Emanuel campaign donors who flew there on United for the elevation of Archbishop Blase Cupich to cardinal at the Vatican.

WMAQ-Ch. 5 first reported that Smith would be heading up security for Lightfoot.

Mayor announces key hires for new administration

By Gregory Pratt
Chicago Tribune

On her second day in office, Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot announced the hiring of several top officials and reiterated that some of her predecessor's high-ranking agency heads would be staying on in her administration.

Lightfoot also held her first Cabinet meeting Tuesday, which she said was focused primarily on team-building. Lightfoot said she'll be meeting with the full group of top city officials on a quarterly basis, interspersed with smaller meetings around subjects such as public safety.

"We want to make sure that people are working collaboratively together, that they get to know their colleagues and draw upon (their) resources and expertise," Lightfoot said.

Chicago police Superintendent Eddie Johnson and Chicago Public Schools CEO Janice Jackson are among a group of officials from former Mayor Rahm Emanuel's administration remaining in their roles, Lightfoot announced in a news release.

Also staying on are City Colleges of Chicago Chancellor Juan Salgado, Chicago Transit Authority President Dorval Carter, Park District Superintendent Michael Kelly and Chicago Housing Authority CEO Eugene Jones, the administration announced.

Lightfoot also announced that Samantha Fields, Emanuel's budget director, will be senior adviser for legislative counsel and government affairs. Samir Mayekar, a former Obama administration official who built a green energy company, will be deputy mayor for neighborhood and economic development.

Metropolitan Planning Council Vice President Marisa Novara, an outspoken critic of aldermanic prerogative, will be commissioner of housing.

Lightfoot's campaign manager, Manuel Perez, will be managing deputy director of legislative counsel and governmental affairs. Tiffany Sostrin, an attorney who previously worked for retired Ald. Margaret Laurino, will be deputy director of legislative counsel and governmental affairs.

Lightfoot also named Allison Arwady acting commissioner of the Chicago Department of Public Health, pending a national search for a full-time leader. Thomas Carney, the Chicago Department of Transportation's first deputy, will also be acting commissioner pending a national search. Andrea Telli will lead the Chicago Public Library, pending confirmation from CPL's board of directors.

Telli led the library's operations for 81 branches since 2011, the administration said.

To replace David Reifman, Emanuel's close ally and prominent zoning attorney at the Department of Planning and Development, Lightfoot is appointing Eleanor Gorski as acting commissioner. Gorski is currently deputy commissioner of planning, historic preservation and sustainability.

Speaking about her Cabinet meeting, Lightfoot said officials emphasized having a plan for summer violence but mostly "spent a lot of time introducing ourselves to each other. People told stories about why they got into public service just kind of as icebreakers."

Afterward, Lightfoot realized she didn't say anything in response to the question.

"I think they figured out why I got into public service," Lightfoot said. "I'm a little overexposed on that point."

Johnson and Jackson left together afterward and headed to the fifth floor. As he walked away, Johnson said an "all-hands-on-deck approach" is how violence should be addressed but didn't stop to chat.

Suspect pressed on if he knew man he shot in '10 was cop

Prosecutors play video excerpts of questioning in trial

By Megan Crepeau
Chicago Tribune

A year after off-duty Officer Michael Bailey's slaying, two seasoned Chicago police detectives sat across from Anton Carter and asked him the "million-dollar question": Did he know Bailey was a police officer when he pulled the trigger?

"A hundred thousand policemen, at least, want to know what Anton Carter was thinking," one of the detectives asked as Carter sat across the table in a tiny interrogation room that day in 2011. "... Did you aim to kill a policeman? What'd you do, just a stickup?"

"I'm a stickup man," responded Carter, who moments later said he preyed on "everybody who's an easy target."

Detectives continued to press him: "What did he look like to you when you walked up? Did he look like a policeman?"

"Just a regular person washing their car," Carter responded.

As testimony in Carter's murder trial entered its second week, Cook County jurors on Tuesday watched about half an hour of excerpts from Carter's video-recorded interrogation. While Carter stopped short of a confession, his incriminating statement represents some of prosecutors' most important evidence.

Bailey, 62, had just finished an overnight shift on then-Mayor Richard M. Daley's security detail in July 2010 when he decided to polish his new Buick Regal, a present to himself in anticipation of retiring in a few weeks. Prosecutors say Carter, allegedly a prolific armed robber and carjacker, approached Bailey in a botched attempt to steal the Buick, sparking a shootout in which Bailey emptied his gun but was shot three times.

Bailey's son, Michael Jr., testified last week that his father was wearing an unbuttoned jersey over his blue police uniform and that he heard the officer yell "police!" before gunshots rang out.

Jurors were given transcripts to aid them while listening to the video, whose sketchy audio was often marred by loud static and background noise.

Attorneys declined to give copies of the transcript to reporters to follow along in court, but the entire video was made public in Carter's court file years ago. The Chicago Tribune ran a front-page story in 2016 featuring the recorded interrogation.

When Carter initially said he could not remember where he was on the morning of Bailey's slaying, police brushed past it, saying repeatedly they already knew he tried to take Bailey's car that morning.

"That a homicide? This is a high-profile case?" Carter asked.

"Yeah, that's what we're talking about here," the detective answered. "... Are you a cop killer or a stickup man? One of the two."

"Stickup man," Carter answered.

Carter returned to prison on an unrelated parole violation shortly after Bailey's death, but he was not charged with the officer's killing until a year after the slaying after allegedly bragging to several other inmates about killing a cop.

As Chicago police took Carter into custody as a suspect in the murder, he said aloud he had been "betrayed" by a fellow detainee, Detective Timothy Murphy testified Tuesday.

With little forensic evidence tying Carter to the slaying, prosecutors are relying on the video statement and testimony from those jailhouse witnesses as well as others who have said Carter also confessed to them about the slaying.

Carter's friend Landon Snerling told authorities in 2011 that Carter bragged of having a "cowboy story" to tell, "upping" a gun on a guy who "upped" a gun back at him, saying he used up all his bullets in the resulting shootout. Snerling took the stand last week but denied remembering anything substantial about those statements to prosecutors and police.

Jurors have also heard from a former inmate who said he heard Carter brag in the lockup at the suburban Bridgeview courthouse. Another man testified he overheard Carter boast about the killing to friends on the South Side in the days after the attack.

Among the prosecution's first witnesses were Bailey's widow and son, who were at the home during the shooting and recalled the chaotic aftermath.

Bailey's wife, Pamela Bailey Wilson, was asleep in bed with two of her grandchildren when she heard screaming and rushed out the front door.

"He was laying on his back and his eyes were still open, and I touched him and his body was warm," she said, shaking her head at the memory. "But he never moved or never acknowledged me or anything."

Bailey was one of five Chicago cops killed in 2010, one of the department's deadliest years in decades.

Prosecutors have won convictions for the slayings of Officers Michael Flisk, an evidence technician killed while investigating a garage burglary; Thomas Wortham IV, fatally shot in an attempted robbery while off-duty outside his parents' home; David Blake, slain while off-duty in an apparent plot to steal his gun collection; and Thor Soderberg, who was fatally shot with his own gun by a mentally disturbed man shortly after finishing his police shift.

Trump officials: US 'not about ... war'

Shanahan, Pompeo brief lawmakers on moves to deter Iran

By Lisa Mascaro, Robert Burns and Susannah George

PATRICK SEMANSKY/AP

Acting Defense Secretary Patrick Shanahan, left, and Secretary of State Mike Pompeo address the media after giving a classified briefing about Iran to lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

WASHINGTON — Tamping down talk of war, top Trump administration officials told Congress on Tuesday that recent actions by the U.S. deterred attacks on American forces. But some lawmakers remained skeptical of the White House approach in the Middle East.

After a day of closed-door briefings on Capitol Hill, Secretary of State Mike Pompeo and acting Defense Secretary Patrick Shanahan said their objective over recent days has been to deter Iran. Now they want to prevent further escalation, Shanahan said.

"We're not about going to war," Shanahan told reporters.

"Our biggest focus at this point is to prevent Iranian miscalculation," said Shanahan, flanked by Pompeo, after back-to-back briefings for the House and Senate. "We do not want the situation to escalate."

The officials arrived on Capitol Hill as questions mounted over President Donald Trump's tough talk on Iran and sudden policy shifts in the region. Skeptical Democrats sought out a second opinion, holding their own briefing with former Obama administration officials, former CIA Director John Brennan and Wendy Sherman, an architect of the Iran nuclear deal.

The competing closed-door sessions Tuesday came after weeks of escalating tensions that raised alarms over a possible military confrontation with Iran.

Trump, veering between bombast and conciliation in his quest to contain Iran, threatened Monday to meet provocations by Iran with "great force," but he also said he's willing to negotiate.

The results of the meetings Tuesday were mixed, with views settling largely along partisan lines.

Sen. Mitt Romney, R-Utah, said the action taken by the Trump administration "is totally appropriate" and sends a message that "if you attack our people, there will be a response."

Romney characterized it as defensive in nature and meant to deter Iran from "malign" actions.

Democratic Rep. Ruben Gallego, a veteran of the Iraq War, left the classified House briefing, saying: "What I heard in there makes it clear that this administration feels that they do not have to come back and talk to Congress in regards to any action they do in Iran."

Democrats are concerned the Trump administration may try to rely on nearly 20-year-old war authorizations rather than seek fresh approval from Congress for any action.

Senate Minority Leader Chuck Schumer, D-N.Y., said he told Pompeo and the others their consultation with Congress has been "inadequate."

Shananan said he and the others heard that message and vowed to better communicate with lawmakers and the public.

In recent weeks, the U.S. sent an aircraft carrier strike group, four bomber aircraft and other assets to the region, and is moving a Patriot missile battery to an undisclosed country in the area. The Trump administration has evacuated non-essential personnel from Iraq, amid unspecified threats the administration says are linked to Iran.

Shanahan said the recent U.S. actions in the region were based on "credible threats" to U.S. forces and interests in the Middle East.

"We have deterred attacks based on our repositioning of assets, deterred attacks against American forces," he said.

Pompeo said he tried to put the Iran situation in the country's 40-year history of "malign" actions.

Pompeo, a former congressman, has become somewhat of a polarizing figure on Capitol Hill, and some lawmakers left the meeting saying he was lecturing and arrogant.

Democratic Rep. Adam Smith of Washington, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said he interjected at one point during the briefing: "We know Iran is bad, OK? What is the policy going forward? There wasn't enough information on that."

Smith said Pompeo was asked why it took so long to brief Congress. Smith said the secretary's answer was, "We were busy." The representataive said it was not an acceptable answer.

Earlier, Brennan told House Democrats that while Tehran wants to avoid conflict, the country's leadership will not capitulate to Trump. Sherman warned that reckless behavior by the Trump administration in Iran is hurting U.S. credibility and undermining moderates in the country. Their comments were conveyed by a person in the room who was not authorized to discuss the private meeting by name.

Top Democrats say Trump escalated problems by abruptly withdrawing the U.S. from the Iran nuclear deal, a complex accord negotiated during the Obama administration to prevent Iran from nuclear weapons production.

"I have yet to see any exhibited strategy," said Democratic Rep. Abigail Spanberger of Virginia, a former CIA officer. She said she finds many of the administration's recent statements on Iran to be "deeply troubling."

Bomb-laden drone from Yemen rebels targets Saudi airport, base

By Jon Gambrell
Associated Press

DUBAI, United Arab Emirates — Yemen's Iranian-allied Houthi rebels attacked a Saudi airport and military base with a bomb-laden drone Tuesday, an assault acknowledged by the kingdom as Middle East tensions remained high between Tehran and Washington.

There were no immediate reports of injuries or damage.

The attack on the Saudi city of Najran came after Iran announced it has quadrupled its uranium-enrichment production capacity, though still at a level far lower than needed for atomic weapons, a year after the U.S. withdrew from Iran's nuclear deal with world powers.

Underlining the tensions, Iranian President Hassan Rouhani is seeking expanded executive powers to better deal with "economic war" triggered by the Trump administration's renewal and escalation of sanctions targeting the Islamic Republic, the state-run IRNA news agency reported.

"A person or a nation might be under pressure, but the Iranian nation will not bow to bullies," Rouhani vowed in a televised speech Tuesday night.

By increasing production, Iran soon will exceed the stockpile limitations set by the nuclear accord. Tehran has set a July 7 deadline for Europe to put forth new terms for the deal, or it will enrich closer to weapons-grade levels in a Middle East already on edge. The U.S. has deployed bombers and an aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf over still-unspecified threats from Iran, which is the biggest rival in the region to the U.S.-allied Saudi Arabia.

Before a briefing on the situation to Congress, acting Defense Secretary Patrick Shanahan suggested the U.S. military response to Iranian threats already has had an effect. He said U.S. military moves have given Iran "time to recalculate," and as a result the potential for attacks on Americans is "on hold," although the threat has not gone away.

In the drone attack, the Houthis' Al-Masirah satellite news channel said they targeted the airport in Najran with a Qasef-2K drone, striking an "arms depot." Najran, 525 miles southwest of Riyadh, lies on the Saudi-Yemen border and has repeatedly been targeted by the Houthis.

A statement on the state-run Saudi Press Agency quoted Saudi-led coalition spokesman Col. Turki al-Maliki as saying the Houthis "had tried to target" a civilian site in Najran, without elaborating.

Al-Maliki warned there would be a "strong deterrent" to such attacks and described the Houthis as the "terrorist militias of Iran."

Similar Houthi attacks have sparked Saudi-led airstrikes on Yemen, which have been widely criticized internationally for killing civilians.

Are 'American Taliban,' others recidivism risks?

Question hangs over Lindh's early prison release

WILLIAM HENNESSY/AP

In this artist's rendering, John Walker Lindh, center, and his attorney James Brosnahan appear before U.S. District Judge T.S. Ellis in federal court in Virginia in 2002.

John Walker Lindh's eyes, dark and wild, were ubiquitous across magazine covers and cable news channels, alongside militants in Afghanistan, after he was captured in November 2001. He was a long-haired guerrilla with a California address — a traitor to some, a misguided kid sucked into Islamic jihad to others.

Dubbed the "American Taliban," Lindh was sentenced to 20 years in prison after pleading guilty to supporting militants who harbored al-Qaida as it planned the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But in a surprise move to some, Lindh will be released from federal prison on Thursday, three years early, federal officials said.

Lindh and other incarcerated American supporters of Islamic militants present a quandary with growing urgency: Is the United States prepared to try to rehabilitate extremists and foreign fighters and welcome them back into society?

"There is very close to nothing in terms of de-radicalizing programs at the federal level," said Bennett Clifford, a research fellow at George Washington University's Program on Extremism. "The current model is hoping long prison sentences for material support of terrorism will be a deterrent."

The Federal Bureau of Prisons is stymied by budget constraints, a sprawling corrections bureaucracy and a top-down approach that focuses on traditional rehabilitation, such as turning away prisoners from gang activity or drugs, Clifford told The Washington Post.

About 500 federal prisoners have been sentenced for terrorism-related crimes, and about a fifth will be released within five years, 62 of them U.S. citizens, researcher Kevin D. Lowry wrote in the Journal for Deradicalization in 2018.

With Lindh's release, and with inmates who have ties to the Islamic State group nearing the end of their sentences, there may be a new focus on culling extremist beliefs before prisoners head back into civil society. But time is nearly up for many. "The offenders about to be released would receive resources at the end of their sentence," Clifford said.

Federal officials have signaled interest in expanding recidivism-prevention and reintegration efforts, although it amounted to one paragraph in the White House's 2018 counterterrorism strategy and focused on radicalization in prison.

There are some breakthroughs. The U.S. District Court for Minnesota, which has had an influx of Islamist terrorism suspects, has pioneered efforts to focus on de-radicalization from extremist beliefs, efforts that include civic education, family involvement and mental health counseling for inmates, Lowry wrote.

Those models were adapted from European programs and include efforts to combat white-supremacist beliefs. But there is no similar national program within federal prisons, Lowry noted.

Lindh will be monitored for three years by federal probation officials, the Bureau of Prisons said.

His early release is opposed by Sens. Richard Shelby, R-Ala., and Maggie Hassan, D-N.H., who wrote a letter Friday to the Federal Bureau of Prisons requesting details about agency efforts to prevent recidivism by militants released from its facilities.

"We must consider the security and safety implications for our citizens and communities who will receive individuals like John Walker Lindh, who continue to openly call for extremist violence," the letter reads.

Bill Cummings, an attorney for Lindh, did not respond to a request for comment.

The lawmakers asked for information about other convicted "terrorist offenders" who may be released from federal prison in coming years, and they inquired about the steps that prisons take to determine whether someone is an "ongoing public threat."

The Bureau of Prisons said in a statement that it "participates in national and international efforts to identify new programs and approaches tailored to reduce the risk terrorist offenders pose inside and outside of prisons."

Lindh, who was raised in California and Maryland, converted to Islam, met Osama bin Laden and joined the Taliban in Afghanistan before the Sept. 11 attacks, although his attorneys maintained that the attacks soured his outlook.

Lindh remains in custody at the Terre Haute Federal Correctional Institution in Indiana.

An anti-abortion protester shouts as a woman is escorted Monday into a Montgomery clinic in Alabama, which enacted the nation's strictest abortion law last week.

To patients, new abortion laws creating uncertainty

By Kim Chandler and Sudhin Thanawala
Associated Press

HUNTSVILLE, Ala. — Abortion clinics are facing protesters emboldened by a flurry of restrictive new state laws as they reassure confused patients that the laws have yet to take effect, abortion providers said.

"We have actually had many people calling and say, 'Are you open? Are you still seeing patients? Is abortion now illegal? Will something happen to me if I come for care?' " said Dr. Willie Parker, one of two doctors providing abortions at the Alabama Women's Center in Huntsville recently.

Last week, Alabama enacted the nation's strictest abortion law, making performing abortions a felony at any stage of pregnancy with almost no exceptions.

Women who came through the doors held hands with loved ones or curled into chairs as they waited.

It is one of only three abortion clinics in the state, and the only one that provides abortions when a woman is up to 20 weeks pregnant. Some patients drove from neighboring states because of a shortage of clinics.

"Our doors are open, and we continue to be here for women in our communities, and we intend to keep it that way," said Dr. Yashica Robinson, an obstetrician and gynecologist who provides abortions at the clinic.

Georgia, Kentucky, Mississippi and Ohio have passed laws that prohibit abortion when a fetal heartbeat is detected — about six weeks, before many women know they are pregnant. Missouri and Louisiana are close to enacting similar bans.

None of the laws has taken effect, and all are expected to be blocked while legal challenges work their way through the courts.

Some lawmakers hope two new conservative justices nominated by President Donald Trump will provide the votes for the Supreme Court to overturn its 1973 Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion nationwide.

That prospect has energized protesters at Mississippi's only abortion clinic and made them more aggressive, with 100 people gathering on some days singing and waving signs—double the usual number, clinic owner Diane Derzis said. "They know they're winning, and they don't care what they need to do," she said.

POWER House, a group that offers escorts to women seeking abortions in Montgomery, Alabama, for the first time hired an off-duty police officer to watch over escorts and patients because of the attention generated by Alabama's new abortion law, said Mia Raven, the group's executive director.

Six anti-abortion protesters gathered outside the Montgomery clinic on a recent day, carrying signs reading "Babies Are Murdered Here" and depicting aborted fetuses.

Abortion opponents disputed the claim that protesters were more aggressive because of the new state laws.

"We have not really had any reports of any heightened activity in the area of protesting of the clinics or anything like that," said Zemmie Fleck, executive director of Georgia Right To life.

Arizona prisons ban book on black men in legal system

By Terry Tang
Associated Press

PHOENIX — Arizona has banned prisoners from reading a book that discusses the impact of the criminal justice system on black men, drawing outcry from First Amendment advocates who say the move is censorship.

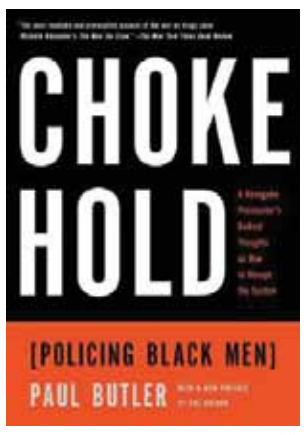
The American Civil Liberties Union called on the Arizona Department of Corrections this week to rescind the ban on "Chokehold: Policing Black Men." The book by Paul Butler, a former federal prosecutor, examines law enforcement and mass incarceration through its treatment of African American men.

"In order for them to ban a book, they have to show the restriction is related to a legitimate prison interest," said Emerson Sykes, an ACLU attorney. "There's no interest to keep inmates from learning about the criminal justice system and policing."

Butler, a criminal law professor at Georgetown University, said his publisher was notified in March that his 2017 book had "unauthorized content." The notice didn't specify what led to the decision but warned some aspect of the book was "detrimental to the safe, secure, and orderly operation of the facility."

Butler said he uses the title, which is a maneuver police have used to restrain a suspect by the neck, as a metaphor for how society and law subjugate black men. Nowhere does he advocate violent behavior.

"I disavow violence because, first, I think it's immoral, and, second, because it wouldn't work," Butler said. "I've received letters from several inmates who have read 'Chokehold' while they are serving time. No one has indicated that reading 'Chokehold' has caused any problems in prison."



THE NEW PRESS

"Chokehold: Policing Black Men," by Paul Butler, has been banned in Arizona prisons.

Arizona's corrections department prohibits inmates from receiving publications that contain any depictions that would incite or facilitate a riot, a resistance or stopping work. They also can't contain pictures, illustrations or text that encourage "unacceptable sexual or hostile behaviors." Any publications with sexually explicit material or sexual representations of inmates and law enforcement also are not permitted.

Corrections spokesman Andrew Wilder said the department had not yet received the ACLU's letter asking for the ban to be reversed and declined further comment Monday.

Prison Legal News sued Arizona corrections officials in 2015 for refusing to deliver four issues in 2014. It said in court documents there were descriptions of "non-salacious" sexual contact between jail guards and prisoners when talking about incidents where inmates were sexually harassed. The case is set for trial later this year.

Supporters say access to books for the more than 2 million people incarcerated in the U.S. can make all the difference for life outside the prison walls. More education decreases the likelihood of repeat offenses and can lead to better job prospects later, according to inmate advocates. They point to studies showing the literacy rates of incarcerated white, black and Hispanic people are significantly lower than their non-incarcerated counterparts.

About half the adult prison population doesn't have a high school degree, said Christia Mercer, a philosophy professor at Columbia University who has taught classes in New York prisons. Reading books can be transformative and help them feel like they are using their time to make something of themselves.

Spend one minute reading this now. Protect your family for a lifetime.

Bizarre caper has touch of Hollywood

Activist sought for N. Korean Embassy incident in Spain

By Barbara Demick and Victoria Kim
Los Angeles Times

JAVIER SORIANO/AFP

The North Korean Embassy in Madrid, Spain, was the site for a commando-style assault in late February.

NEW YORK — The North Korean Embassy in Madrid was a soft target.

All it took was imitation handguns, fake business cards and some guile for a group of human rights activists to capture the embassy on the evening of Feb. 22. Over four hours, they took hostages, smashed photographs of the country's late dictators and absconded with a stash of electronics and thumb drives.

They later escaped by masquerading as diplomats, driving away from the embassy in its own cars, flying North Korean flags.

The ringleader behind this audacious caper was Adrian Hong, 35, of Los Angeles, according to court documents.

One of the most celebrated advocates for human rights in North Korea, Hong was a fixture at congressional hearings. He traveled around the world giving lectures and penned impassioned op-eds. He wrangled an invitation to a White House Christmas party, where he and his wife posed for a photo with Barack and Michelle Obama.

To Hong's supporters, the incident at the North Korean Embassy was a natural extension of a lifetime's work on behalf of oppressed North Koreans, a worthy cause taken perhaps too far. His lawyer described it as a harmless prank.

But the U.S. government isn't seeing it that way.

Acting on an extradition request by the Spanish government, a U.S. magistrate last month issued a warrant for Hong's arrest on charges of breaking and entering, robbery with violence and intimidation. Federal marshals raided Hong's apartment in downtown Los Angeles on April 18. Although he wasn't home, they arrested one of his alleged accomplices, a 38-year-old former Marine, Christopher Philip Ahn, who is being held without bail.

AP

Adrian Hong of Los Angeles is a human rights activist.

Hong is now a fugitive, being actively pursued by U.S. marshals.

In the past, Hong was a darling of hard-liners within the U.S. government who supported a change of governments in North Korea. More than once, he called on the State Department to intervene in diplomatically sensitive operations to bring North Korean defectors to safety.

The most dramatic was in 2017; after the assassination of Kim Jong Nam, the half-brother of current leader Kim Jong Un, Hong boasted on his website of helping to rescue Kim Jong Nam's son Kim Han Sol. (Several people familiar with the case but not authorized to speak publicly substantiated the claim.)

Now, Hong's supporters say the Trump administration is throwing him under the bus for fear he might undermine the president's outreach to North Korea. Not incidentally, the government might want to dispel any perception that it orchestrated the embassy takeover — which took place five days before a summit in Hanoi between Kim and President Donald Trump.

One of the many curious aspects of the case is that Hong was the first to report his involvement in the Madrid incident. After flying back from Spain, he contacted the FBI, meeting with agents on Feb. 27 in New York to hand over the electronics taken from the embassy, according to court documents.

"He obviously is someone who likes to do the right thing by the U.S. government, as evidenced by the fact that he turned over the materials from the embassy within a couple of days of returning," said Lee Wolosky, a New York lawyer representing Hong.

According to the complaint filed by Spanish authorities, Hong had first approached the embassy in early February, presenting a business card that identified him as Matthew Chao, a managing partner of Baron Stone Capital with offices in Toronto and Dubai, United Arab Emirates. He claimed he wanted to set up a meeting about investing in North Korea.

When Hong returned to the embassy just past the 5 p.m. closing time, he was admitted into the gated compound by a gardener. Hong was instructed to wait on a bench, but instead he opened the gate to let in his accomplices, about eight people in all, according to a Spanish court order.

They were armed with crowbars, knives, tape and shackles and what the complaint alternately identified as "simulated firearms" and airsoft pistols.

Exactly what happened during the four hours in the embassy is in some dispute. There were about seven North Koreans in the embassy at the time: diplomats, staff and their families. The Spanish complaint says that the activists beat and threatened the North Koreans, tying them up and covering their heads with plastic bags.

At one point, according to court records, they took the North Korean charge d'affaires to a basement room and tried to persuade him to defect, which he refused. His wife and 8-year-old son locked themselves in another room.

Meanwhile, the wife of another North Korean diplomat, hearing the commotion downstairs, escaped from the embassy by jumping from a second-floor terrace. Though injured, she was able to get help.

Spanish police arrived later. According to the complaint, Hong answered the door, disguising himself as a diplomat by putting on a red lapel pin of Kim Il Sung's portrait, required for all North Koreans.

He told the police there was "no problem inside the premises," the complaint says.

By about 9 p.m., the activists cleared out. Most drove away in the North Korean Embassy's official cars, including a Mercedes-Benz, which police later found nearby with its engine running and doors open. Hong called an Uber from an account he'd opened under the alias Oswaldo Trump, according to court documents.

Hong's supporters say the North Korean staff had a motive to exaggerate the level of violence used so that they wouldn't be punished back in Pyongyang for allowing the activists into the embassy.

"We were invited into the embassy, and contrary to reports, no one was gagged or beaten," said a statement on the website of Free Joseon, an organization Hong founded. "Out of respect for the host nation of Spain, no weapons were used."

Some of Hong's old compatriots in the human rights struggle said they are not surprised that he turned rogue.

"He seemed to think North Korea will never change through naïve human rights activism, that it was at a point there needed to be a vigorous uprising," said Kang Chol-hwan, a prominent North Korean defector and author based in Seoul. "He is a fighter type."

Elaborate $4.3M heist, almost perfect, until ...

Man gets 10 years in US prison after 7 years in Mexico

By Kyle Swenson
The Washington Post

U.S. ATTORNEY'S OFFICE

A bank manager planned the perfect $4.3 million heist in 2011. He just didn't expect a Mexican checkpoint.

WASHINGTON — It could be done, he figured. Sure, there was security at the bank, but it was thin — cameras only, no armed guards. With a careful game plan, strategic lies and the right timing, Gerardo Adan Cazarez Valenzuela realized he could stroll out of the KeyBank branch where he worked in Anchorage, Alaska, with millions in cash.

It was June 2011 when Cazarez started turning the gears on his plan. Although his judgment was clouded by addictions to cocaine and alcohol at the time, he meticulously laid the groundwork.

On July 29, 2011, Cazarez told his boss he wanted to stay late to plan an ice cream social for customers. When Cazarez, an Alaskan in his mid-20s wearing a red shirt and black suit, was alone in the bank, he stepped into the vault, as federal agents would later lay out in court documents. He loaded $4.3 million in cash into three boxes, rolled them out of the building on a cart, and placed them in his car.

Before driving off, Cazarez set a timer on the vault so it would not open for six days. By then, he planned to be safely over the Mexican border. As he pulled out of the parking lot, a chartered private jet was already waiting to hurry him on the first leg of his journey south.

But Cazarez never made his getaway. Busted by authorities in Mexico, he was dumped into a Mexican jail, conditions he referred to in a recent letter to a federal judge as "the filthiest place imaginable." Extradited back to the United States in 2018 after seven years of incarceration, Cazarez was sentenced April 29 to 10 more years in prison in the United States, according to a Justice Department news release.

In his letter to the judge, Cazarez, now 34, maintained that he had executed his plot to pay for his now-deceased father's medical treatment. But federal authorities say workplace revenge also played a part. Cazarez was concerned KeyBank would cut his position and put him out of a job. And an unresolved issue is still hanging over the case: $500,000 of the stolen money is still missing.

"I obviously suck at being a criminal and know that any illegal activity will land me back in prison," Cazarez wrote to the judge, pleading for leniency.

Cazarez's plan was both meticulously detailed and beset by flashes of movie-plot grandiosity. "The only thing I know how to do to make a living is to work hard and excel at anything I set my mind to," he wrote to the judge.

Days before stealing $4.3 million, he trained new employees in a way that would eliminate the need for two individuals to gain access to the vault — a move that set the stage for his solo heist.

A day before stealing the money, Cazarez lifted $30,000 from the vault to pay for his chartered plane. After bagging his $4.3 million, the jet flew Cazarez from Anchorage to Seattle, according to court documents. There, as he'd planned, he met up with his girlfriend. Together, they purchased a Ford Fusion. Cazarez also asked a cabdriver about purchasing a gun, and the cabdriver hooked him up with an AK-47, a handgun and ammunition for $4,000.

The outlaw couple drove to California, and then planned to head toward Cazarez's uncle in Mexico. The uncle suggested Cazarez and his girlfriend take a bus rather than drive the difficult Mexican roads. The couple crossed into Mexico at Tijuana, abandoned the Fusion, bought tickets for Sonora, Mexico, and boarded the bus on Aug. 1, 2011.

The next day, the bus was stopped by Mexican authorities at a checkpoint inside the country. The passengers were told to disembark with their luggage. Inside Cazarez's bag, they discovered millions of dollars.

"The moment I was caught I felt a great weight lifted off my shoulders," Cazarez would later write to the judge. "Although I had no idea what lay ahead, I knew that it was all for the best."

Ahead were criminal charges in Mexico "analogous to money laundering and illegal possession of firearms for smuggling the cash and firearms into Mexico," according to federal authorities.

But there was also a problem of the cash count.

Mexican authorities only discovered $3.8 million in his bags. After Cazarez served his prison sentence in Mexico and was extradited back to the United States in September 2018, the missing half-million dollars would become a point of contention. When he pleaded guilty to theft of bank funds last January, prosecutors wanted to know what happened to the cash.

According to Cazarez, the money was given to his father for medical treatment, and then stolen. The defendant did not go into details about how the money was taken.

Prosecutors, however, allege Cazarez had hidden away the $500,000 in Washington state in case he was ever caught.

To save whales, ships slow down off Calif. to avoid orca deaths

Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A growing number of shipping companies are slowing down as they approach San Francisco and other California ports so they are less likely to injure or kill whales.

Marine experts say four of the 10 gray whales found dead near San Francisco this year were killed by ships, the San Francisco Chronicle reported.

When the campaign started about six years ago, only 17% of incoming ships were slowing down, said Greater Farallones National Marine Sanctuary superintendent Maria Brown. Now 45% are throttling down by half, to 10 knots (11.5 mph).

There are no speed limits at sea, so vessels can zip along as fast as they want, usually 20 knots, or about 23 mph. The large vessels often travel through national marine sanctuaries to get to their destination ports.

"Endangered blue whales come to the sanctuary every year. We're the bread basket, the restaurant for blue whales," Brown said. "And the National Marine Fisheries Service has determined that the No. 1 human-caused death of blue whales is ship strikes."

The campaign began in 2013, when NOAA extended shipping lanes several miles beyond the continental shelf, where blue and humpback whales feed. A year later, the Greater Farallones and Cordell Bank sanctuaries began voluntary vessel speed reductions from May to November, peak time for blue and humpback whale visits to the area.

Twenty-two shipping firms, which represent 45% of the 8,000 inbound vessel trips through the Golden Gate every year, were honored Thursday for cutting their speed in 2018 to 10 knots or less in areas populated by whales. Those include the Farallones, Channel Islands, Monterey Bay and Cordell Bank marine sanctuaries.

"Just as anyone driving down the highway doesn't want to hit an animal, nobody in a ship wants to hit a whale," said John Berge, vice president of the Pacific Merchant Shipping Association, which deals with maritime trade issues.

While there is a growing awareness by shippers to reduce speed for the whales' sake, it's difficult to track how much the 5-year-old campaign has affected them, said Mary Jane Schramm, a spokeswoman for the sanctuary.

"It's hard to say, these whales live and die offshore," Schramm said.

Also, large vessel traffic has increased over the last few decades, and it is widely recognized that shipping lanes adjacent to San Francisco Bay ports are especially susceptible. That's because record numbers of humpback and blue whales have been feeding in recent years off the coast and even in San Francisco Bay.

The injuries have extended this year to gray whales. They normally do not enter the bay or linger in the area during their winter migration, which usually ends in May.

Ten gray whale carcasses found in the Bay Area this year.

'Medicare for All' exceeds what other nations offer

House budget panel to hold hearing on health care proposal

By Ricardo Alonso-Zaldivar

Independent studies estimate the "Medicare for All" proposal would increase government spending.

WASHINGTON — Generous benefits. No copays. No need for private policies. The "Medicare for All" plan advocated by leading 2020 Democrats appears more lavish than what's offered in other advanced countries, compounding the cost but also potentially broadening its popular appeal.

While other countries do provide coverage for all, benefits vary. Canada's plan, often cited as a model, does not cover outpatient prescription drugs and many Canadians have private insurance for medications. Many countries don't cover long-term care.

But the Medicare for All plan from Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders would charge no copays or deductibles for medical care, allowing only limited cost-sharing for certain prescription drugs. Sanders would cover long-term care home and community-based services. Dental, vision and hearing coverage would be included. The House version of the legislation is along similar lines.

"Medicare for All proposals would leapfrog other countries in terms of essentially eliminating private insurance and out-of-pocket costs, and providing very expansive benefits," said Larry Levitt, a health policy expert with the nonpartisan Kaiser Family Foundation. "It raises questions about how realistic the proposals are."

Shifting the U.S. health care system to a government-run "single-payer" plan is one of the top issues in the 2020 Democratic presidential primary, but the candidates are divided. Some have endorsed Sanders' call, while others want to expand coverage within the current mix of private and government insurance. Independent studies estimate Medicare for All would increase government spending — from $25 trillion to $35 trillion or more over 10 years. It stands no chance with Republicans controlling the White House and the Senate, but it is getting hearings in the Democratic-led House.

Economist Sherry Glied, dean of New York University's Wagner School of Public Policy, says the offer of generous benefits may be needed to persuade Americans satisfied with employer coverage that they would be better off in a new government plan.

"You are going to have to be very generous if you want this to be politically appealing to lots of people," said Glied, who was a senior health care adviser in the Obama administration.

Glied says components like benefits, co-payments and deductibles would all be negotiable.

A second congressional hearing on Medicare for All is scheduled Wednesday before the House Budget Committee. The plan is a punching bag for Republicans trying to tag Democrats as "socialists."

A report from the Congressional Budget Office will be the focus of Wednesday's House hearing. Another report, for the nonpartisan Commonwealth Fund, was written by Glied. Among its findings: Other countries don't necessarily take the same approach as Medicare for All, using a range of strategies to cover all their residents.

The report found that one group of countries — including Denmark, Britain and Germany — provide comprehensive benefits. That includes, for example, mental health. They charge low copays. Those countries are the closest to Medicare for All.

A larger group — including Australia, France, Netherlands, Norway, Singapore, Sweden, Switzerland and Taiwan — offer broad benefits but there may be gaps, and cost sharing is higher. Australia charges $60 for specialist visits. The Netherlands has a $465 deductible. Dental coverage may be limited.

Canada has a narrow national benefits package. It doesn't cover outpatient prescriptions, long-term care, mental health, vision and dental. But there's no cost sharing for hospital and doctors' services. Canadians rely on private insurance and provincial governments to fill gaps.

Trump appeals ruling on House finance subpoena

By Spencer S. Hsu
The Washington Post

STAN HONDA/AGENCE-FRANCE PRESSE 2012

Judge Amit Mehta ruled Monday that President Trump cannot block the House subpoena of financial records.

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump's lawyers on Tuesday notified a federal judge that they have appealed "all aspects" of a Monday ruling that the president's accounting firm must turn over his financial records to Congress.

The two-page notice filed in federal court in Washington marks the latest move in a gathering legal battle over Congress' oversight powers.

"Plaintiffs ... hereby appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit all aspects of this Court's order and opinion from May 20, 2019," stated lawyers for Trump, the Trump Organization and several related companies in the notice to U.S. District Judge Amit Mehta.

Mehta, in a 41-page ruling Monday, rejected arguments from the president's lawyers that the House Oversight Committee's demands for the records from Trump's accounting firm, Mazars USA, were overly broad and served no legitimate legislative function.

"It is simply not fathomable," the judge wrote, "that a Constitution that grants Congress the power to remove a President for reasons including criminal behavior would deny Congress the power to investigate him for unlawful conduct — past or present — even without formally opening an impeachment inquiry."

It was not clear how quickly the appeals court would schedule briefings and oral arguments. The court's calendar lists only one argument through the summer. But the court can add cases as needed before a three-judge panel "if the case is important enough or requires quick disposition," D.C. Circuit Clerk Mark Langer said Tuesday.

It also would be up to circuit judges whether to put the committee subpoena on hold pending consideration of Trump's appeal.

Mehta denied Trump's bid to block the subpoena while his lawsuit filed April 22 continues, and went further by rendering a final decision to speed consideration by the appeals court.

Mehta had refused to stay his order to comply with the subpoena beyond seven days to allow time for an appeal, but Trump's lawyers acted within hours. Speaking to reporters on Monday after the ruling, Trump called the opinion "crazy" and said he would appeal, adding, "We think it's totally the wrong decision by, obviously, an Obama-appointed judge."

On Tuesday, some legal experts said they expected Trump's legal adversaries to continue to try to accelerate proceedings, and not be party to the administration's stated intention of defying and delaying Congress's oversight functions.

Kerry Kircher, who served as House general counsel from 2011 to 2016 and deputy general counsel from 1995 to 2010, said Tuesday that he was not surprised by Mehta's order or how quickly the judge moved. And he said there "is a very good chance these records end up in Congress' hands" by 2020 because courts have so often upheld congressional investigative powers over executive branch and private party challenges.

"Congress has broad oversight," Kircher said.

The Mazars case could move quickly, because the executive branch has far fewer tools to resist congressional subpoenas that target documents from private companies, than it has when asserting executive privilege to prevent aides from testifying, said Andy Wright, a former Obama associate White House counsel and House oversight committee staff director from 2007 to 2011.

Trump has argued the congressional inquiries are politically motivated attacks on the authority of the presidency, while Democrats insist the subpoenas are essential to ensuring no president is above the law.

When the lawsuit was filed, Trump's private attorney Jay Sekulow said the president's team "will not allow Congressional Presidential harassment to go unanswered."

Mazars said after Monday's court decision that the company said in a statement that it will "respect the legal process and fully comply with its legal obligations."

added their voices to the impeachment inquiry chorus.

"There is political risk in doing so, but there's a greater risk to our country in doing nothing," Castro said on Twitter. "This is a fight for our democracy."

Tweeted DeGette: "The facts laid out in the Mueller report, coupled with this administration's ongoing attempts to stonewall Congress, leave us no other choice."

One Republican congressman, Justin Amash, of Michigan, has called for impeachment proceedings. He said Tuesday he thinks other GOP lawmakers should join him — but only after reading special counsel Robert Mueller's report carefully.

Republican House leader Kevin McCarthy dismissed Amash as out of step with House Republicans and "out of step with America." And Sen. Lindsey Graham, of South Carolina, said wryly of Amash's position, "I don't think it's going to be a trendsetting move."

As Democrats weigh their options, Trump is almost taunting them by testing the bounds of executive power in ways few other administrations have. The White House contends that even former employees like McGahn do not have to abide by subpoenas from Congress.

PATRICK SEMANSKY/AP

The House Judiciary Committee begins a hearing without former White House counsel Donald McGahn on Tuesday.

A short time later, House Judiciary Committee Chairman Jerrold Nadler issued subpoenas for more Trump administration officials — former White House communications director Hope Hicks and Annie Donaldson, a former aide in the White House Counsel's Office — for documents and testimony.

Trump's former White House counsel is the most-cited witness in Mueller's Trump-Russia investigation report, recounting the president's attempts to interfere with the probe. And that makes his silence all the more infuriating for Democrats.

Nadler gaveled open Tuesday's hearing with a stern warning that McGahn will be held in contempt for failing to appear.

"Our subpoenas are not optional," Nadler said. "We will not allow the president to stop this investigation."

However, Rep. Doug Collins, the ranking Republican on the committee, spoke scornfully of Nadler's position, calling the session a "circus" and saying the chairman preferred a public "fight over fact-finding."

Democrats are "trying desperately to make something out of nothing" in the aftermath of Mueller's report, Collins said.

A lawyer for McGahn had said he would follow the president's directive and skip Tuesday's hearing.

Nadler said the committee would vote to hold McGahn in contempt, though that's not expected until June, after lawmakers return from the Memorial Day recess.

Democrats are encouraged by an early success in the legal battles, a Monday ruling by a federal judge against Trump in a dispute with Congress over financial records. Trump's team filed notice of an appeal on Tuesday.

But Pelosi's strategy hasn't been swift enough for some lawmakers. In particular, several members of the House Judiciary Committee feel they must take the lead in at least launching impeachment proceedings. They say an impeachment inquiry could give Democrats more standing in court, even if they stop short of a vote to remove the president.

"I think that's something a lot of members of the committee — and more and more members of the caucus — think is necessary," said Rep. Steve Cohen, D-Tenn. "I think an inquiry, as the Senate Watergate hearings were, would lead the public to see the misdeeds of this administration."

Others, though, said they prefer the step-by-step approach.

"We want to make sure that we're following all the legal processes, everything we've been given, to truly make the best decisions," said Rep. Lucy McBath, D-Ga., a freshman on the judiciary panel.

Mar-a-Lago gate-crasher wants to fire lawyers

Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — A Chinese woman charged with lying to illegally enter President Donald Trump's Mar-a-Lago resort told a stunned judge Tuesday that she wants to fire her attorneys and represent herself.

Yujing Zhang surprised U.S. District Judge Roy Altman during what was to have been a routine hearing over whether to delay her trial, which is scheduled to start next week. She faces up to five years in prison on charges of unlawful entry and making false statements. She has pleaded not guilty.

Zhang

According to media reports, Zhang, 33, told Altman she wants to dismiss her public defenders and represent herself.

"I don't need the attorneys, thank you," Zhang told Altman through an interpreter.

Zhang speaks some English, according to court documents, but her skill level is a matter of dispute between prosecutors and her attorneys.

Altman said he would not allow Zhang to dismiss her attorneys until she has been examined by a psychiatrist. If deemed competent, the judge said, she could represent herself.

Zhang, a Shanghai-based business consultant, is charged with lying to Secret Service agents to enter Mar-a-Lago on March 30.

Agents say she had arrived in the U.S. days earlier and told them she was at Mar-a-Lago to attend a United Nations friendship event that she knew had been canceled.

Prosecutors say she was carrying four cellphones, a laptop and an external hard drive.

When agents searched her hotel room at a nearby hotel, they say they discovered more electronics gear — including a device to detect hidden cameras — $8,000 in cash and numerous credit and debit cards.

The president was visiting Mar-a-Lago the weekend of Zhang's arrest, but was at his nearby golf club when she arrived, and she was never near him.

Progress seen in negotiations on the debt limit and spending

WASHINGTON — Top leaders of both parties in Congress made progress Tuesday on two must-do items on the legislative agenda: averting automatic budget cuts and meeting a deadline later this year to increase the borrowing limit.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., who's been a key force in getting negotiations up and running, said both the debt limit increase and the outlines of a two-year spending agreement would likely be merged into one package.

Driving the talks is the desire to avoid automatic reductions that threaten the Pentagon and other federal agencies with budget cuts averaging 10 percent. At the same time, increasing the so-called debt limit is required in order to avert a market-quaking default on government obligations such as interest payments and Social Security benefits.

House joins debate over sending TSA workers to border

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers clashed Tuesday over the Trump administration's move to send hundreds of Transportation Security Administration employees to the U.S.-Mexico border.

The TSA is asking federal air marshals, airport screeners and others to support a buildup of federal agents at the border to deal with migrants.

"It just goes to show what a crisis we have down on the border," Rep. Debbie Lesko, R-Ariz., said during a hearing.

But the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, Bennie Thompson, D-Miss., said shifting airport workers was "the contrived manufacturing of a crisis to the detriment of the TSA."

Travel industry groups worry that the shift could leave airports understaffed during the peak summer season.

Washington is 1st state to allow composting of human bodies

SEATTLE — Gov. Jay Inslee signed legislation Tuesday making Washington the first state to approve composting as an alternative to burying or cremating human remains.

It allows licensed facilities to offer "natural organic reduction," which turns a body into about two wheelbarrows' worth of soil over several weeks.

Loved ones are allowed to keep the soil to spread, just as they might spread the ashes of someone who has been cremated — or even use it to plant vegetables or a tree.

Supporters say the method is an environmentally friendly alternative to cremation, which releases carbon dioxide and particulates into the air, and conventional burial, in which people are pumped full of formaldehyde and other chemicals that can pollute groundwater.

Seeking Brexit support, May proposes new referendum

LONDON — In a major concession, British Prime Minister Theresa May on Tuesday offered U.K. lawmakers the chance to vote on whether to hold a new referendum on the country's membership in the European Union — but only if they back her thrice-rejected Brexit agreement.

May made the offer as part of a desperate attempt to persuade Parliament to back a divorce deal that will allow the U.K. to make an orderly, if delayed, departure from the EU.

She plans to ask the House of Commons to vote in early June on a withdrawal agreement bill, in what May called a "last chance" to seal a Brexit deal. Soon after that vote, she will give a timetable for her departure as Conservative leader and prime minister.

In a speech Tuesday, May said the bill would include "a requirement to vote on whether to hold a second referendum" that would give Britons a chance to approve or reject the terms of Brexit. A referendum is a key demand of opposition lawmakers who have until now rejected May's deal.

"I do not believe that this is a route we should take," said May, who has long opposed a new public vote on Brexit. "But I recognize the genuine and sincere strength of feeling across the House on this ... issue."

The Brexit referendum, however, will only happen if Parliament backs the EU withdrawal bill and it becomes law, something that still seems unlikely, despite May's last-minute changes.

Jeremy Corbyn, leader of the main opposition Labour Party, said May's new bill was merely "a repackaging of the same old bad deal, rejected three times by Parliament."

30 tornadoes, flooding from storms in central US

ST. LOUIS — A strong band of storms brought more than 30 tornadoes across the central U.S., damaged homes in Oklahoma, demolished a racetrack grandstand in Missouri and drenched waterlogged states with more water and more flooding.

The severe weather started in the Southern Plains on Monday night and moved to the northeast. Missouri and parts of Illinois and Arkansas were in the crosshairs Tuesday.

By Wednesday, the storm will move into Great Lakes region, where it will weaken.

Patrick Marsh, warning coordination meteorologist for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Storm Prediction Center, said eyewitnesses reported 26 tornadoes Monday and six more Tuesday. One, near Tulsa, was a mile wide with winds in the range of 111 mph to 135 mph.

US told to consider consequences of ship seizure

UNITED NATIONS — North Korea's U.N. ambassador said Tuesday the Trump administration should consider the possible consequences that the recent U.S. seizure of a North Korean cargo ship could have on relations between the two countries and immediately return the vessel.

Kim Song said at a news conference the "outrageous act" of seizing the ship was aimed at bringing maximum pressure on North Korea to make it "kneel down."

The vessel Wise Honest, North Korea's second-largest cargo ship, was first detained by Indonesia while transporting coal. The U.S. announced May 9 that it had seized the ship because it was carrying coal in violation of U.N. sanctions, a first-of-its kind enforcement action that came amid a tense moment in relations with North Korea.

In California: The state sued Tuesday to block the Trump administration from canceling nearly $1 billion for a high-speed rail project linking Los Angeles and San Francisco, escalating the state's feud with the federal government.

The Federal Railroad Administration announced last week it would not give California the money awarded by Congress nearly a decade ago, arguing that the state has not made enough progress on the project.

The state must complete construction on a segment of track in the Central Valley agricultural heartland by 2022 to keep the money, and the administration has argued the state cannot meet that deadline and has failed to show adequate progress.

Welcome to Illinois: Crumbling roads, crumbling finances

"Infrastructure" is a boring bureaucratic word that undersells a serious problem facing Gov. J.B. Pritzker: Illinois needs to repair its crumbling roads and bridges. Is that a slightly sexier sell? Pritzker and lawmakers are hashing out plans for a six-year capital construction spending spree that could total an astonishing $41.5 billion. Now do we have your attention?

A significant investment in the upkeep of highways, mass transit systems and other, pardon us, infrastructure is overdue. The last capital program was approved a decade ago. Yet given Springfield's profligate ways, we've got two basic concerns: Where would all this money come from? And would it be spent responsibly on the right projects? We've got our doubts, especially since the governor expects to borrow billions of dollars to make the magic happen. As if Illinois taxpayers don't already face towering mountains of public debts.

A preliminary overview of the plan surfaced last week, with proponents urging the typical hurry-up-and-support-it timeline. The General Assembly is scheduled to be in session until May 31. The plan includes a list of investments including nearly $2.9 billion for the Regional Transportation Authority, which oversees CTA, Metra and Pace suburban buses, and $1 billion for reconstruction of a stretch of Interstate 80 in Will County. More about the selection process below.

BRIAN CASSELLA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Construction continues on the Jane Byrne Circle Interchange in March.

The $41.5 billion would require tax increases and significant new borrowing by a state with the worst credit rating in the country. Details of the "Rebuild Illinois" plan are almost certain to change through negotiation. But (warning!) that doesn't mean legislators would agree to a smaller package — though that's what they should do. Looking back at Gov. Pat Quinn's 2009 capital spending project bill, the price tag increased over the months from $26 billion to $29 billion to $31 billion.

The Pritzker plan would be funded in part by about $1.8 billion annually in new or higher taxes and fees. The Illinois motor fuel tax would jump from 19 cents to 38 cents per gallon. The state currently doesn't tax ride-shares or parking, but that would change: Say hello to a $1 tax for all ride-shares and a 6 percent or higher parking garage tax. Vehicle registration fees would increase, though electric vehicles would pay $250 per year, not the crazy $1,000 one legislator proposed. Also on the docket: a new tax on cable, satellite and streaming services, a liquor tax increase and more. In Illinois, it's always more.

The Pritzker administration is counting on more than $10 billion in federal money and $6.6 billion in local government and privately sourced money. But the biggest share of the $41.5 billion would come from borrowing — bond sales supported by the tax hikes. The borrowing total could exceed a fat $17 billion, the Tribune reports. But what if officials get their revenue estimates wrong on the new taxes and fees? That's what happened to the last capital bill: The state had to scramble when video gaming revenue came in short.

As for the wish list of projects: We're certain many are vital, just as we're sure there are boondoggles contained therein, and probably some important pieces missing. Lawmakers have been working on this plan for a while, but the rush to pass this bill and others in the current session will lard up the total with freebie dams or community college investments for supportive legislators.

The Illinois economy requires infrastructure upkeep to promote growth. And yes, upfront money from bonding allows governments to build infrastructure that will last for many years. We recognize the need to raise taxes and fees to make that investment.

But the more that revenue comes from users, such as vehicle owners or transit riders, the fairer. Forcing all Illinois taxpayers to take on still more long-term debt is yet another case of today's Illinois politicians sticking tomorrow's Illinois citizens with paying for projects the pols ordered up way back in 2019.

What we don't want is another breathless exercise in maximalist borrowing. The governor and lawmakers should pare back this bill. Roads and bridges are in bad shape, but so are Illinois' finances.

Harsher penalties for hit-and-run drivers

About once a week in Illinois, someone dies in a hit-and-run vehicle crash. A little boy who'd just been to the park with his grandfather, both struck while trying to cross a street. A freshman girl walking to high school, killed by a man charged with driving drunk at 7:45 a.m.

Much more often, someone is badly injured. On Mother's Day afternoon in Kane County, a 7-year-old girl riding a bike was hit, allegedly by a man in a pickup truck who left the scene. She is recovering from broken ribs and other injuries. A suspect has since been charged with three felonies.

Hit-and-runs are a confounding problem, and one that has grown in recent years. Car accidents overall are up — blame more people on the road in a strong economy with low gas prices in recent years, and more drivers focused on mobile phones rather than their surroundings. But hit-and-runs, which can leave victims suffering while waiting for medical attention and send law enforcement scrambling, have climbed even more. The driver flees in an astounding 20 percent of car-pedestrian accidents nationally, according to AAA.

Lexi Hanson, 7, is now home from the hospital after being badly injured in a hit-and-run vehicle crash in Kane County on May 12.

Does this say something about human character? Or just circumstances? In some states, penalties for driving while intoxicated outpaced those for hit-and-runs, creating an incentive for people to flee — even if only long enough to beat a blood alcohol test. When cars hit bikes and pedestrians, some drivers speed off because they can. Their car isn't visibly damaged, as it might be in a car-on-car wreck.

Drivers with something to hide, like substance abuse or a poor driving record, may feel it's worth the risk to try to get away. Illinois is among states that allow immigrants in the country illegally to nevertheless drive legally with licenses or permits. That has been shown to trim hit-and-run incidents — provided, of course, that an immigrant driver who hits someone doesn't panic and flee.

State law expects drivers to stop immediately, with hit-and-run penalties — which can include jail time, fines and loss of driving privileges — potentially kicking in after half an hour absent from the scene. A bill in the Illinois legislature would allow tougher penalties for offenders who kill someone in a hit-and-run while distracted by an electronic device, or who are intoxicated.

Some cities and states have approved systems similar to the Amber Alert to send notifications on the make, model and license plate number of a car suspected in a hit-and-run with injuries. Often, though, police don't have all those identifying details. There are also concerns about overusing alerts that may not be effective and could distract drivers.

Despite the sense that security cameras capture everything in the public way nowadays, very few hit-and-runs are ever solved. Most involve only property damage and don't warrant the effort to chase down the details. In a high-profile exception, John "Quarters" Boyle, earlier convicted in the Hired Truck and Illinois tollway corruption investigations, was nabbed in a hit-and-run witnessed by Illinois Comptroller Susana Mendoza. He pleaded guilty last month to a misdemeanor for plowing into four parked cars.

National reporting suggests that few hit-and-run offenders do jail time, instead plea bargaining down to probation, fines or community service. The stakes should be higher when there are innocents in the way, with stiff enough penalties to tip the odds against bolting. Drivers in a panic might naturally want to zoom away. The system should give him or her every reason to stay.

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

The desire to reduce legal immigration is at all-time lows; the desire to increase it is at all-time highs; and the rock-solid median answer is to just leave legal immigration at its current level. ... Increasing legal immigration does not seem smart given that two-thirds of Americans oppose such a move, but cutting immigration looks no better, if we're talking purely about public opinion. A Pew question on whether immigrants strengthen or burden the country is also helpful, because the results are broken out by generation since 1994. It shows that generations of Americans have generally become more supportive of immigration as they've aged, and also that each generation starts off more pro-immigration than the last.

de Blasio

Politics these days is a form of entertainment, and for the comedy portion of the Democratic presidential nomination fight we now have New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio. He has no chance of winning, but we'll break our longtime policy and consider an endorsement if he resigns as mayor while he's running. Our friends at the New York Post greeted his candidacy with a front page of people laughing at the news. ... Mr. de Blasio now wants to fail upward to the White House, which is another expression of the progressive mind: Skip town and let someone else clean up the mess. It's all enough to make us hope that Mr. de Blasio could get some traction in the primaries, so the country would get a chance to examine his record. But that's probably too much to hope for, since even socialist voters have a limit on the level of righteous incompetence they'll accept in a politician.

Now more than ever, Illinois lawmakers need to stand up for abortion rights

ERIC ZORN

It was a different era back in early March when I last wrote in favor of the Reproductive Health Act, a pair of legislative initiatives in Springfield aimed at enshrining and strengthening abortion rights in Illinois.

Abortion was a simmering issue then, in part because the addition of two conservative justices to the U.S. Supreme Court had put in doubt the future of Roe v. Wade, the 1973 ruling that established abortion as a constitutional right in most cases. And in part because the administration of President Donald Trump had just moved to block federal funding of women's health centers that "provide, promote, refer for or support abortion," even if none of those funds went to abortion services.

The companion proposals in Illinois — House Bill 2495 and Senate Bill 1594 — were languishing in committee as the administration of new Gov. J.B. Pritzker put its energy into other agenda items.

Then came the ferocious onslaught of anti-abortion bills in other states that has brought the issue to a full national boil:

March 15: Kentucky's governor signs a so-called heartbeat bill banning abortion after fetal cardiac activity can be detected, as early as six weeks after conception and before many women realize they are pregnant. The bill has no exceptions for victims of rape or incest.

March 21: Mississippi's governor signs a similar "heartbeat" bill.

March 25: Utah's governor signs a bill banning abortion after 18 weeks' gestation but allows exceptions for victims of rape and incest.

April 11: Ohio's governor signs a "heartbeat" bill, again with no exceptions for victims of rape and incest.

May 7: Georgia's governor signs another "heartbeat" bill that critics say is the most draconian in the nation because it theoretically exposes women who obtain abortions to the death penalty.

May 15: Alabama's governor signs a bill banning the use of "any instrument, medicine, drug or any other substance or device (intended) to terminate the pregnancy of a woman known to be pregnant" at any point after conception, even in cases of rape and incest. It exempts women from punishment but allows for prison terms of up to 99 years for abortion providers.

May 17: Missouri's governor signs a "heartbeat" bill with no exceptions for victims of rape or incest.

Long somnolent supporters of abortion rights all across America have accordingly awakened at last to the grave and growing threat to women's bodily autonomy. Just this week has seen hundreds of abortion-rights rallies and demonstrations in cities coast to coast, including Chicago.

It's now a new era.

The bills that comprise the Reproductive Health Act are just the sort of counterpunch that demonstrators and other concerned citizens are demanding. Yet despite the national uproar, the proposals are still languishing in committees with a little more than a week to go until the end of this legislative session. And Pritzker, who campaigned as a champion for choice, has stayed on the sidelines.

The proposals underscore women's rights to make "autonomous decisions" about whether to remain pregnant. They repeal the Parental Notice of Abortion Act of 1995 that requires minors to inform a parent or legal guardian or get a waiver from a judge before having an abortion. They lift restrictions on late-term abortions and require private insurance plans to cover abortion services.

And, as chief House co-sponsor Rep. Kelly Cassidy, D-Chicago, emphasized to me in an interview Tuesday, the measures repeal dormant statutory provisions calling for criminal penalties against abortion doctors and allowing localities to effectively ban abortion clinics by imposing medically unnecessary requirements on them.

"Those laws were passed long ago and then blocked by the courts," Cassidy said. "But they didn't go away. They're still on the books. An adverse federal court ruling could reinstate them immediately."

In early March, opponents blasted the Reproductive Health Act as "extreme" for turning access to abortion into "a positive good in Illinois law."

That was before the nation saw repeated examples of what extremism on abortion really looks like, and before we took the full measure of the harsh intentions of abortion's most determined foes.

Access to abortion is a positive good, especially when contrasted with the alternative.

The General Assembly and Pritzker have the opportunity to say that loud and clear in the waning days of this legislative session, which ends May 31. This is their moment. They should seize it.

Trump's plaintive but welcome message to Iran: Can we talk?

BY DOYLE MCMANUS

You know we're in trouble when President Donald Trump looks like the adult in the White House.

Starting on May 5, Trump's hawkish national security adviser, John Bolton, dramatically escalated pressure on Iran — dispatching an aircraft carrier and B-52 bombers, ordering up contingency plans to send 120,000 troops, warning against allegedly threatening behavior.

Trump finally intervened, saying he's not interested in launching a new war in the Middle East. He sent Secretary of State Mike Pompeo to reassure allies that he wants negotiations, not airstrikes.

That shouldn't be a surprise. Trump campaigned for the presidency on a promise to end America's long, costly wars. He enjoys thumping his chest — remember when he warned North Korea of "fire and fury like the world has never seen" — but the bluster is intended to jump-start negotiations, a pursuit at which Trump believes he has no peer.

So it has been with Iran. After all the tough talk and menacing warships, Trump's basic demand of the ayatollahs was almost plaintive: Can we talk?

"What they should be doing is calling me up," the president said May 9. "We can make a deal, a fair deal."

The minicrisis with Iran wasn't the first time Bolton's efforts to put the U.S. on a war footing has conflicted with Trump's preference for deal-making. That difference has produced a remarkable string of public disagreements between the president and his chief national security adviser.

On North Korea, Bolton has argued that the United States will never persuade Kim Jong Un to give up nuclear weapons, and that Trump should consider military strikes instead. Trump disagrees, and even removed Bolton briefly from his negotiating team.

In Syria, after Islamic State lost its self-declared caliphate, Bolton said U.S. troops would stay in the country until the last Iranian went home. Trump overruled him and ordered the troops out. (He later relented, but still insists the troop commitment will be brief.)

In Venezuela, Bolton was the administration's leading champion of a U.S.-backed coup attempt against the autocratic regime of Nicolas Maduro. When the coup collapsed, Trump was furious, reportedly raging that Bolton had misled him about the chances of success.

In Iran, Bolton has long promoted regime change as his goal. Earlier this year, on the 40th anniversary of Iran's revolution, he posted a taunting video message to the country's leader: "I don't think you'll have many more anniversaries to enjoy."

That's not Trump's message.

"We're not looking to hurt Iran," the president told reporters. "I want them to be strong and great."

All those collisions raise a question: Why does Bolton still have his job?

After last week's war scare, Washington's gossip mill went into overdrive. Insiders traded stories of Trump's annoyance with his national security adviser, especially over the perception that Bolton, not the president, was making key decisions.

Officials insist that Bolton's job is not in serious danger. In past similar instances, when Trump has decided to fire an aide, he has aired his frustration on Twitter and floated the names of possible replacements.

That hasn't happened to Bolton yet. Instead, Trump has joked about his adviser's hawkishness, making it sound as if he enjoys playing the good cop to Bolton's bad cop.

"I actually temper John, which is pretty amazing, isn't it?" he told reporters. "I have John Bolton and I have other people that are a little more dovish than him. And ultimately I make the decision."

In any case, Bolton isn't the root of the problem between the United States and Iran. The two countries have clashed since Islamic revolutionaries overthrew the U.S.-backed shah in 1979, stormed the U.S. Embassy in Tehran and held 52 Americans hostage for more than a year.

In the current round, the Trump administration accuses Iran of supporting militants in Iraq, Syria, Lebanon and Yemen. Iran accuses the White House of trying to destroy its economy and topple its leadership. Both sides are essentially correct.

Trump raised tensions a year ago when he pulled out of the 2015 nuclear agreement and imposed stiff new economic sanctions, including a move to choke off Iran's oil exports.

But on May 2, when the White House threatened to punish China, India and six other countries unless they cut their Iranian oil imports to zero, that got Tehran's attention — and raised fears that Iran might seek to retaliate through terrorist attacks or Iranian-backed militant groups.

A week later, U.S. officials were alarmed by intelligence indicating that Iranian security forces had loaded short-range missiles onto vessels heading into the Persian Gulf. It was unclear whether Iran was preparing to strike an outside target or reacting defensively to what they saw as a growing U.S. threat.

The two countries were falling into a dangerous spiral: reading each other's actions as aggressive, but seeing their own responses as defensive. That's a situation that makes accidental or inadvertent escalation more likely.

For Trump, the solution is simple: direct negotiations with Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, much like the two summits he has held with North Korea's Kim.

"I'm sure that Iran will want to talk soon," the president tweeted Thursday.

So far, Iran's supreme leader has refused to reopen the nuclear deal, the main issue Trump wants to discuss. His foreign minister, Mohammad Javad Zarif, says he has offered to engage in talks on other issues at a lower level but that the Americans haven't replied.

So there are no direct channels of communication between Washington and Tehran, another factor that makes it easy for each side to misinterpret the other's moves.

Trump likes to start crises as a way to force adversaries to talk. With Bolton's help, he's succeeded at the first step. Now can he find a way to take Step 2?

SAT 'adversity score': Let's mend it, don't end it

CLARENCE PAGE

As a sign of our changing times, hip-hop legend Dr. Dre provided my favorite story in the recent college admissions bribery scandal.

Fabulously wealthy rap producer and performer Dre, whose real name is Andre Young, wrote a snarky Instagram post in March about his daughter getting into the University of Southern California without "jail time." Ha, ha.

But he later deleted the post after news reported reminded him and the rest of us that he had donated $70 million to the school in 2013.

Oops! Sorry about any embarrassment this unnecessarily brought to Dre's daughter. But I also cannot help but take some lopsided pleasure at this odd sign of racial progress: A wealthy rap star can ease his child's path through the college admissions process in much the same way that privileged white families have done for decades: big donations to the school.

The allegations against Hollywood celebrities have brought new attention — and a new sense of outrage — not just to the involved parents but also to the widespread unfairness in college admissions that makes a mockery of meritocracy.

With that in mind, I appreciate the well-intended, although controversial, effort by the College Board to make the system more fair to a diversity of applicants by taking their socioeconomic background into account.

Officials at the College Board, which creates and administers the SAT exam to about 2 million students annually, is implementing a new addition to its test. College officials are calling it an "adversity score."

I appreciate its intentions, although it falls short of its goal by substituting one potentially unfair standard with another.

The "adversity score" calculates 15 factors from the applicant's home, school and neighborhood environment, including the local crime rate, poverty levels, housing values, vacancy rates, free lunch rates and academic rigor of his or her high school's curriculum.

"An SAT score can only tell you so much," College Board CEO David Coleman explained in a CNN interview. "But when you put it alongside other information, you can see which students score remarkably well in very demanding circumstances."

That's the sort of story that I have heard from liberals and conservatives alike over the years who ask the same question: Why not expand opportunities for poor white students who don't have the advantages that a lot of wealthier black students have?

Yet, even a modest move in that direction draws critics from the left, who fear African Americans and Hispanics in particular will get lost in the mix if a special outreach effort is not made in their behalf.

Too often shortchanged in that discussion are Asian and black immigrant students who tend to score higher than all other racial groups, leading to their disproportionately high enrollment numbers at prestigious colleges.

And any move toward recognizing socioeconomic class instead of race takes fire from some voices on the right, like the Manhattan Institute's Heather Mac Donald, author of "The Diversity Delusion: How Race and Gender Pandering Corrupt the University and Undermine Our Culture." She blasted the "adversity score" as a backdoor to racial quotas by the College Board, which she said is "under relentless pressure from the racial-preferences lobby" and "the anti-meritocratic ideology of 'diversity.' "

Yet, we are reminded by the ongoing college admissions scandal that our current system falls way short of true "meritocracy" too.

I think President Barack Obama got it right when he saw a fundamental unfairness in the notion that his daughters, for example, deserved a break because of their race that was not available to a poor but equally promising white youth.

The problem with the College Board's attempt to level that playing field lies in its attempt to apply an objective standard, a numerical score, to the very subjective issue of who has the best chance to blossom as a student in the rigorous academic standards of a selective college or university.

At best, the "disadvantage level" of individual students, as categorized into groups by a multiple-choice survey, should be only the beginning of a longer discussion. But with tens of thousands of applications pouring in for a very limited number of freshman slots, time for such talk is severely limited.

Still, the "adversity score" takes an important step in the right direction but risks replacing old biases with new ones. As a motto from the Bill Clinton administration said about affirmative action, we should try to "mend it, don't end it."

The Illinois marijuana legalization debate: Who's afraid of a little home grow?

BY JOHN DE FRIEL AND RANDAL JOHN MEYER

Why are Illinois legislators trying to perpetuate the war on drugs against home gardeners in their cannabis legalization bill? That is exactly what the proposed cannabis home-grow ban amendment to Gov. J.B. Pritzker's legalization plan would do.

To be sure, Gov. Pritzker's ambitious plan to legalize cannabis legislatively is an important one, and much of the bill should serve as a model for other states going down the legalization path. However, the Illinois bill makes the unfortunate political error of wading into a concern that has derailed legalization efforts in states such as New York: home grow. Expected amendments to the bill from state Sen. Heather Steans, D-Chicago, and state Reps. Kelly Cassidy, D-Chicago, and Toi Hutchinson, D-Olympia Fields, eliminate provisions that would allow individuals to grow up to five cannabis plants at home.

Indeed, the New York Medical Cannabis Industry Association's opposition to allowing home-grown cannabis was quickly attacked as "individual and corporate greed" by cannabis consumer advocacy groups, contributing to the downfall of the bill this legislative session in New York. Already, the Illinois chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws has noted that any such change could result in the loss of its support for the bill.

Frankly, NORML and other critics have a point. This amendment would amount to a carve-out more significant than any government-subsidized agriculture product. Home vegetable and herb gardens are not under legal threat by the farming industry; home brewing of personal-use beer has not been outlawed in any state since 2013; and home cultivation of personal-use tobacco is not illegal.

ABEL URIBE/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Gov. J.B. Pritzker's, second from left, plan to legalize recreational pot faces amendments from lawmakers like Sen. Heather Steans, at microphone, that could derail it.

It makes no sense to outlaw home cultivation of cannabis in legal states, let alone to try to enforce such a ban. If law-abiding citizens are able to buy home-brew beer kits, then adults ought to be able to grow, trim and cure a safer substance. Even tobacco companies don't try to stop individuals from growing tobacco and smoking homemade cigarettes. Cannabis cronyism is jumping the shark by endangering the next step in cannabis legalization in states like Illinois and New York.

From an industry perspective, home-grown cannabis accounts for a tiny percentage of overall market share. The results of the home-grown process are unlikely to compare favorably with the quality of commercially available products. Furthermore, the time and attention that home cultivation requires only attracts the most dedicated hobbyists.

This is why the Global Alliance for Cannabis Commerce has endorsed continuing the trend that occurred in previous legalization efforts by allowing home-grown cannabis, noting that "humans have been both gardening and consuming cannabis — safely — since the Stone Age." The bottom line is that home grow for personal use is not a serious threat to industry vibrancy and presents the same public health concerns as home gardening and home brewing — virtually none.

The state of Illinois should leave people alone to enjoy gardening rather than perpetuating drug war policies.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

Lightfoot is up to the challenge

It's a historic moment to welcome Lori Lightfoot as our new mayor of Chicago. We have put trust in you to take the helm of this city. It's a challenging task, but with our blessings, we know you will prevail.

— Mumtaz U. Khan, Chicago

Pulling for the new mayor

Mayor Lori Lightfoot does not look like a forceful person — until she opens her mouth. She comes across as a highly intelligent, ethically minded civic leader with a backbone of steel who is determined to do the best she can for all of Chicago. That means dealing with the major financial shortages she inherits, a dilemma Rahm Emanuel tried for eight years to overcome. It means cleaning up and changing problematic old habits in the City Council despite expected opposition. Most challenging of all, it means dealing with gang- and gun-infested South and West Side neighborhoods that need more projects that will keep vulnerable young people out of drug-selling trouble and help families survive disadvantaged conditions. Hopefully, the new mayor's African American heritage will benefit her in this regard.

Lightfoot seems to have the mental toughness to confront these issues and others. She also will need diplomatic and public relations skills, which she already has, as indicated by her wide-ranging, harmony-seeking and money-raising connections with other political forces. I'm a suburban resident who identifies primarily with Chicago, where I spent much of my life. So I'm pulling for Lori Lightfoot to get all the support she needs to be an effective mayor.

— Ed Stone, Northbrook

Outsourcing security

Some of Mayor Lori Lightfoot's priorities are to restore faith in City Hall and fill the hole in the city budget. However, she is outsourcing some security jobs traditionally filled by Chicago police officers. This means adding people to the payroll, and likely these new jobs will offer pensions or some other benefits. So instead of looking within the Police Department's talent pool for someone already on the payroll, whose pension will not cost the city and its residents more money, Lightfoot has chosen to dig a different hole that will need to be filled. This is hardly a step in restoring confidence in government. I thought with this last election, "the machine" had finally been broken, but apparently the parts are just being oiled.

— Brigid Cronin, Chicago

Increase foot patrols

As Mayor Lori Lightfoot takes the reins of our Chicago, I would like to suggest that one of her first requests of police Superintendent Eddie Johnson be to immediately push his officers to perform more foot patrols on the South and West sides.

Police need to be seen as members of the community, as well as its protectors. Foot patrols ensure exercise, neighborhood conversations and high visibility, along with giving officers a chance to really understand the areas that they are assigned to.

Bringing back the age-old image of Officer Friendly strolling up and down the street is one form of community policing that never goes out of style.

— Ephraim Lee, Chicago

Will the mayor help teachers?

I am a Chicago Public Schools teacher currently teaching third grade on the West Side at Spencer Elementary Technology Academy.

I understand that Mayor Lori Lightfoot supports local schools. I want to bring in the light with her. However, there are CPS schools in a state of survival mode. Teachers are verbally, mentally and sometimes physically abused daily. Teachers of color and middle school teachers have it the worst.

CPS wants teachers to be perfect in an imperfect system. We are not supported by parents, school officials, our administration or students. "Bad teachers" are not born, but they are made in Chicago. I wish Lightfoot could see firsthand the injustice, abuse and neglect of teachers.

Become a substitute teacher for a month or send someone to be your eyes and ears as a temporarily assigned teacher in an elementary school on the West or South Side. Throw the school ratings out the window. Teaching is a never-ending story. We are never done with paperwork, and we are not appreciated! Parents want us to "parent" their children when it is convenient. We pay for a plethora of school supplies, coats, uniforms, field trips and projects out of our own salaries.

I would love to know the new mayor's plans for the future of teachers and students in Chicago.

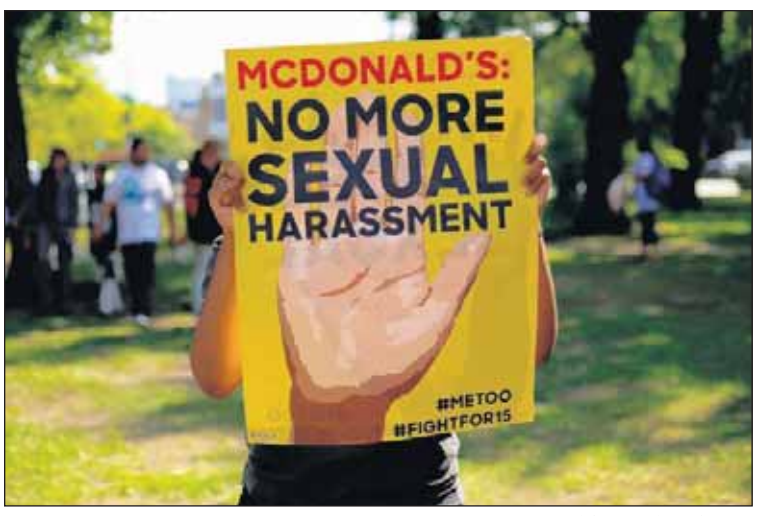
McDonald's facing pressure on harassment



JOSHUA LOTT/GETTY

Burger giant rolling out new training, hotline to combat complaints made by restaurant employees

By Alexia Elejalde-Ruiz
Chicago Tribune

McDonald's has responded to mounting complaints about sexual harassment with employee training programs and a new anonymous reporting hotline.

The Chicago-based fast-food chain sent a letter Monday to Illinois Democratic Sen. Tammy Duckworth detailing its efforts, in response to a letter Duckworth sent the company in December expressing her concerns about multiple sexual harassment complaints made by its restaurant employees.

On Tuesday, the Fight for $15 announced the filing of 25 new sexual harassment charges with a federal agency and lawsuits against McDonald's, bringing the total to 50 since the union-backed advocacy group started calling out McDonald's on the topic three years ago.

The complaints filed Tuesday allege employees, some as young as 16 years old, were subjected to groping, indecent exposure, propositions for sex and lewd comments by supervisors in both corporate and franchise restaurants across 20 cities, including Chicago.

The complaints allege that repeated efforts by workers to seek assistance from management were ignored or mocked. Some workers saw their hours reduced, were disciplined or fired after they complained, the advocacy group claims. McDonald's said it had no comment beyond the letter it sent Monday.

"For three years, we've been speaking out, filing charges and even going on strike to get McDonald's to confront its sexual harassment problem," said a statement from Tanya Harrell, a McDonald's worker from Louisiana who alleges a coworker attempted to rape her in a bathroom stall. "But these new charges show

The Hoxton working on a space for co-working

Hotel brand will offer 23,000 square feet of area for 294 desks

The Hoxton has quickly established itself as a place to see and be seen in Chicago's Fulton Market district.

Now the London-based boutique hotel brand also wants to be known as a place to work.

Parent company Ennismore said it plans to open a co-working space within the 182-room hotel in October. The co-working brand, called Working From_, is coming to the recently opened Chicago hotel at Green and Lake streets and to the Hoxton Southwark that opens in London this summer, the company said.

Working From_West Loop will be in 23,000 square feet on the third and fourth stories of the building, which has 11 floors plus an outdoor roof deck.

There will be room for 294 desks.

The Hoxton, which opened in Chicago in April, is joining an increasingly crowded field of shared office space providers locally and nationally. Led by industry giant WeWork, co-working companies have more than tripled their total space, and their total combined clients, in the past three years, according to data from Newmark Knight Frank and Chicago Creative Space.

Chicago is expected to have more than 57,000 co-working members in almost 3.9 million square feet of space by 2020.

The hospitality company looks to distinguish itself by offering hotel-quality amenities, including 24/7 hours of operation, the company said in a statement. Other perks include a wellness space, guest passes, snacks, and, when available, $25 hotel room rates.

Co-working memberships range from $30 per day to $700 a month for a private studio.The co-working space also will include two meeting rooms, two terraces and weekly events.

The Hoxton was developed by Chicago-based Shapack Partners, whose other projects in Fulton Market include the Soho House hotel and private club a short walk south of the Hoxton.

The developer, led by Jeff Shapack, has done previous co-working deals in the area with WeWork and The Wing, which caters to women.

The Hoxton already has established itself as a popular gathering spot in the area just west of the Kennedy Expressway. It includes a large, open lobby, as well as two restaurants and a bar from Boka Group.

The Hoxton, which began in London in 2006, also has hotels in Amsterdam; Paris; Brooklyn in New York; and Portland, Ore., with plans to open in Los Angeles this fall.

New Coke gets role on 'Stranger Things'

Partnership will relive one of the company's darker chapters

Associated Press

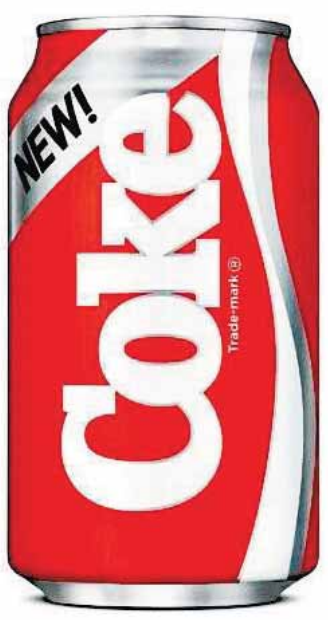
NEW YORK — Coca-Cola drinkers will get a chance to relive one of the company's darker chapters as New Coke makes a comeback under a partnership with the Netflix drama "Stranger Things," the companies announced Tuesday.

Season 3 of the show will take place in the summer of 1985, when Coca-Cola changed its formula for Coke. New Coke was considered one of the biggest marketing blunders of all time, and the new version was dropped after 79 days, though sales of the original Coca-Cola rebounded.

"The summer of 1985 did in fact change everything for us with the introduction of New Coke, which was also arguably one of the biggest pop culture moments of that year," said Oana Vlad, director of Coca-Cola Trademark, Coca-Cola North America.

The New Coke recipe had to be retrieved from the beverage company's safe for the "Stranger Things" partnership.

"All told, everything took about six months and was top-secret," said Peter Shoemaker, director of sparkling category commercialization.



COCA-COLA

New Coke originally was launched in summer 1985.

Workers also had to re-create the logo and the slightly different Coke red for the cans from more than 30 years ago.

"The partnership with Coke gives Netflix the opportunity to reach a massive audience via one of the most recognizable brands in the world in a deeply authentic way," said Barry Smyth, Netflix's head of global partner marketing.

On Thursday, Coca-Cola will release a limited number of cans of New Coke as part of a "Stranger Things" package.

Netflix said it hasn't accepted any money from Coke for the prime placement of soda in the new season and that show creators Ross and Matt Duffer conceived of the idea on their own.

Netflix has built a video business worth more than $150 billion by giving its users an advertising-free alternative to cable and satellite. But the company has begun to experiment with ways of working with large corporations without selling traditional ads.

"Stranger Things" is Netflix's most popular original series, according to data from outside researchers, and has served as a way for Netflix to toy with new business opportunities.

Market growing like weeds

Midwestern states like Illinois could rival those out west in cannabis biz

By Ally Marotti
Chicago Tribune

The cannabis industry in the U.S. has long been centered around states like Colorado and Oregon, but now, marijuana sales in Illinois and its neighboring states east of the Mississippi River are poised to rival those out west.

The U.S. cannabis market is heading for massive growth, with sales that are expected to reach $22.7 billion by 2023, including $16.8 billion in recreational sales, according to a report out Tuesday from Chicago-based cannabis research firm Brightfield Group. Political support is growing around legalization efforts, and medical programs are expanding around the country.

In Illinois, lawmakers are working to capture some of those potential recreational sales. They hope to pass a bill by the end of May that would legalize recreational use of the still federally illegal drug by January.

Currently, the top five markets are west of the Mississippi, with Colorado, Oregon and Washington making up 42 percent of total U.S. sales, according to the Brightfield report. Sales in Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, New Jersey and New York together make up 11 percent.

By 2023, those market shares are expected to flip, Brightfield predicted, with the eastern states making up 34 percent of the market, and the western states dropping to 20 percent.

"A lot of it comes down to population density," said Bethany Gomez, managing director of Brightfield Group. "There's much more opportunity in these areas that have larger populations and the market size can be larger ... Illinois is going to be huge."

California is expected to remain on top, with one-fifth of total demand. But Illinois and Michigan are expected to rival Colorado

American Airlines files lawsuit against unions

Mechanics accused of illegal work slowdown to gain leverage

By David Koenig
Associated Press

FORT WORTH, TEXAS – American Airlines is accusing its mechanics and their unions of conducting an illegal work slowdown to gain leverage in contract talks, and the airline is asking a federal judge to stop the activity.

The airline says mechanics have caused about 900 cancellations or long delays since early February by taking an unusually long time to repair planes and by refusing to work overtime.

On Monday, American filed a lawsuit in federal district court in Fort Worth against the Transport Workers Union and the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, which together represent American's roughly 10,000 aircraft mechanics.

WILFREDO LEE/AP

The president of the Transport Workers denied that workers are engaging in a slowdown.

"American Airlines is trying to punish us for doing exactly what we are supposed to do, which is ensure that there are safe aircraft in the air," said John Samuelsen.

The last bargaining session occurred in late April in front of a federal mediator. Samuelsen said talks were stalled over pay, health care benefits and job security.

Samuelsen said American is pushing to perform more maintenance work outside the U.S., which he said could threaten the jobs of 6,000 mechanics. He said workers were willing to strike over the outsourcing plan. By federal law, airline workers can't legally strike until a mediator declares an impasse in negotiations.

In its lawsuit, American said that it canceled 644 flights and delayed another 270 flights by at least two hours from Feb. 4

Cuba goes all in on tourism

Island bets on visitors to combat Trump's actions

By Andrea Rodriguez
Associated Press

ISMAEL FRANCISCO/AP

Tourists take photos while being transported to the Laguna del Tesoro, in the Zapata Peninsula, Matanzas, Cuba.

VARADERO, Cuba — The battle for Cuba's economic future is being waged on its beaches. And at its all-inclusive resorts, dive sites and cobblestone colonial plazas.

As most of Cuba's economy stagnates or declines, the country has launched a full-scale effort to turn virtually the only bright spot — tourism — into an engine that can drag the rest of the communist island through its worst economic crisis in two decades. In government meetings and propaganda, it has now set a goal of drawing 5 million tourists in 2019 — perhaps the modern-day equivalent of its Soviet-era dependence on the annual sugar-harvest production.

"In the middle of the hardening of the blockade on Cuba, the activation of Title III of Helms-Burton by the president of the United States, we're assuming responsibility for injecting foreign exchange and developing the economy," said Ivis Fernandez, the top tourism official in Matanzas province, home to the beach resort town of Varadero.

The Trump administration is intently focused on scaling back tourism to the island as part of a campaign to smother the Cuban economy and force its government to sever ties with President Nicolas Maduro's government in Venezuela.

Trump recently activated a section of the 1996 U.S. law known as Helms-Burton, allowing lawsuits against foreign companies doing business on properties confiscated after the island's socialist revolution. His administration has also pledged to limit the legal reasons under which Americans can visit Cuba, saying too many people are disguising illegal tourism as educational, religious or other types of travel. The U.S. has also prohibited Americans from patronizing a series of hotels and other facilities run by the military conglomerate that controls many of the most important sectors of the Cuban economy.

But despite the restrictive measures, the Cuban government is only doubling down on its bet that tourism to one of the world's last communist nations will continue to surge.

Cuba began to open the island to tourists after the collapse of the Soviet Union and the subsequent loss of billions a year in aid. In 1996, Cuba had 30,000 state-owned hotel rooms and about a million tourists a year.

Last year it had about 70,000 rooms, with an additional 24,000 in privately owned bed-and-breakfasts.

In total, Cuba drew 4.7 million tourists in 2018, a 1.3% rise over the previous year that puts its latest goal of 5 million within reach. Visits to the island are already running 7% higher than the same period last year, when some 639,000 U.S. travelers took a trip, the second-highest of any nationality except Canada.

Official figures show that 257,000 Americans visited Cuba in the first four months of 2019 — a 93% rise over the same period last year. Meanwhile, about 142,000 came on cruise ships, a form of travel that remains legal and is largely responsible for the rising number of American travelers to Cuba. Only 40,000 American cruise passengers visited Cuba in the first four months of 2018.

Cuba is trying to revive businesses ranging from agriculture to textiles by turning them into part of the supply chain for the tourism business. State-run factories, warehouses and workshops are largely in disrepair after years of embargo and central planning, and many millions earned by hotels and tour buses must be turned around and spent on imported goods ranging from food to bedsheets.

In a country full of mango and guava trees, it's also not unusual to see imported tropical fruits and juices at hotel breakfast buffets as Cuba's decrepit agricultural sector struggles to find a way to move enough produce to satisfy visitors.

"The big problem with tourism as a foreign-exchange earner is the amount of importing that it has to do," said Jose Luis Perello, an economist and expert on tourism. "In order to keep developing tourism we need national industry to become more dynamic."

If the Trump administration is successful, the island might never get the chance.

Along with the collapse of the Venezuela economy and the reduced amount of cheap oil Maduro's government sends to Cuba, increased U.S. pressure is blamed for a cash crisis that has forced the country to start rationing basic foods and limit power consumption by state-run enterprises.

"They're going after Cuba's strengths, in this case the tourism sector, and trying to seek out its vulnerabilities," Raul Rodriguez, director of the University of Havana's Center of Hemisphere and U.S. Studies, wrote in the independent journal Temas. "Boosting sanctions is an attempt to bankrupt the Cuban state."

Experts say that the state-run tourism sector brings in $3 billion a year and the private side brings in the same, despite being nearly one-third the size. In a country where food lines are growing, aid from Venezuela is dwindling and industries like nickel and sugar are mostly stagnant, tourism also might be one of the only ways forward.

On the paradise-like beaches of Varadero, small crabs crawl out of sand dunes and groups of tourists seem to forget their worries as they laze in the sun.

The city currently has 21,200 hotel rooms and is trying to build 1,000 more per year for at least the next five years, managed in partnership with hospitality giants Melia and Barcelo of Spain and Fiesta Americana of Mexico.

While Spanish hotel chain Iberostar could be a major potential target of lawsuits under the activation of the Helms-Burton provision, owner Miguel Fluxa did not appear worried at an international tourism fair last week.

"I do not know (what is going to happen with Helms-Burton)," he said. "The only thing that I know is that any step we have taken we have taken according to the law."

US delays part of ban on sales to Huawei

90-day exemption only for existing hardware, software

By Joe McDonald and Frank Bajak
Associated Press

A woman checks a Huawei smartphone in a store in Beijing. Huawei founder Ren Zhengfei said Tuesday the company has "supply backups" if it loses access to U.S. components.

The United States is delaying some restrictions on U.S. technology sales to Chinese tech powerhouse Huawei in what it calls an effort to ease the blow on Huawei smartphone owners and smaller U.S. telecom providers that rely on its networking equipment.

The Trump administration insists the sanctions are unrelated to its escalating trade war with China, and many analysts see it as aimed at pressuring U.S. allies in Europe to accede to Washington's entreaties to exclude Huawei equipment from their next-generation wireless networks, known as 5G.

The U.S. government on Monday amended last week's order restricting all technology sales to Huawei, the world's biggest maker of mobile network gear and the No. 2 smartphone brand. It granted a temporary, 90-day exemption, but only for existing hardware and software.

It also said that grace period could be renewed.

Shares in tech companies rose Tuesday after some news organizations erroneously reported that the amended order amounted to a blanket reprieve for Huawei.

"It's just housekeeping. It's not a capitulation. It's a very pragmatic solution to avoid unintended consequences to third parties," said Kevin Wolf, who oversaw a related case involving China's No. 2 telecoms supplier ZTE as assistant secretary of commerce for export administration under President Barack Obama.

The U.S. claims Huawei is a cybersecurity risk and has targeted it against the backdrop of a wider battle with China over economic and technological preeminence that has included tariffs on billions worth of trade and limits on business. U.S. officials say Huawei is legally beholden to China's repressive rulers but have provided no evidence that it has intentionally allowed its equipment to be used for espionage.

Huawei founder Ren Zhengfei sought to put a brave face on the situation, saying Tuesday that the company has "supply backups" if it loses access to American components. Huawei Technologies Ltd. relies on Google's Android operating system and U.S. components suppliers for its smartphones.

"I should say this impact will be very big, but Google is an extremely good company," Ren Zhengfei told Chinese reporters. "We are discussing emergency relief measures," he added, without giving details.

Industry analysts say Huawei might struggle to compete if it cannot line up replacements for Google services that run afoul of the U.S. curbs.

Google says its basic services still will work on existing Huawei smartphones. However, the company would be barred from transferring hardware or software directly to Huawei. That would affect maps or other services that require the American company's support.

China's government repeated its promise to defend Chinese companies abroad but gave no details of what Beijing might do.

The 90-day grace period announced Monday by Washington exempts from U.S. licensing requirements any technology needed to maintain and support existing networking equipment and smartphones. It also authorizes U.S. providers to alert Huawei to security vulnerabilities and engage the Chinese company in research on standards for next-generation 5G wireless networks.

"This license will allow operations to continue for existing Huawei mobile phone users and rural broadband networks," Secretary of Commerce Wilbur Ross said in a statement.

But still in place are requirements that government licenses be obtained for any sales to Huawei unrelated to existing equipment.

The Commerce Department said the grace period would allow rural U.S. telecom operators that depend on Huawei equipment for "critical services" time to make other arrangements. Companies that supply software, such as Google for Huawei's Android phones, can provide updates.

FCC chairman Pai supports a $26.5B T-Mobile-Sprint merger

By Tali Arbel and Michelle Chapman

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Ajit Pai says the $26.5 billion merger of T-Mobile and Sprint would speed up 5G deployment in the U.S.

NEW YORK — A key federal regulator says he backs T-Mobile's $26.5 billion takeover of rival wireless carrier Sprint, a crucial step for the deal's approval.

Federal Communications Commission Chairman Ajit Pai said Monday he supported the deal because the two companies promised to expand mobile internet access in rural areas and roll out 5G, the next generation of mobile networks.

While Pai's backing is important, further steps remain. The full commission of three Republicans and two Democrats still must vote, and the Justice Department also must clear it. State attorneys general also may move against the combination.

Pai said Monday that the combination will help bring faster mobile broadband to rural Americans.

The companies have made promises on building out 5G and expanding rural broadband before, but now they are attaching timelines and agreeing to penalties if they fail to meet their commitments. For instance, the companies promise to make fast internet available to 99% of Americans within six years after the deal's close.

T-Mobile US Inc. and Sprint Corp. also said Monday that they would sell Sprint's prepaid cellphone brand Boost Mobile to address antitrust concerns.

Several public-interest advocates dismissed the companies' promises Monday as not solving the issues posed by industry consolidation. Along with labor groups, the advocates have argued that the deal will lead to price increases and job cuts. Democratic lawmakers have also been skeptical of the companies' promises.

Just because the FCC seems ready to approve the deal doesn't mean the Justice Department will, as the two agencies have different criteria. The Justice Department evaluates deals on whether they harm competition and raise prices for consumers, while the FCC examines whether a merger fulfills "public interest" goals. Expanding internet access to more people could count as one such goal, for example.

U.S. Rep. David Cicilline, D-R.I., who heads the House antitrust subcommittee, called on the Justice Department to require that Sprint and T-Mobile show that the deal won't harm consumers.

"Empty promises will not make this transaction a good deal for American workers and consumers," he said.

Justice Department spokesman Jeremy Edwards declined to comment Monday.

Sprint and T-Mobile argue that the combination will lead to better 5G service. They have made promises before to create jobs and build a home-internet business to compete with cable companies as well as Verizon and AT&T. They've also promised not to raise prices for three years.

The Obama administration rebuffed the companies' earlier effort to merge.

Shares of T-Mobile jumped 5.5% in afternoon trading, while Sprint's stock soared 22%.

General Motors' Maven car-sharing service is dropping eight North American cities, including Chicago and New York. The company would not say where it will continue to operate.

GM's car-share service to shut down in 8 cities

Associated Press

DETROIT – Maven, General Motors' car-sharing service, is being shut down in about half of the 17 North American markets it operates.

The company wouldn't say Tuesday where Maven will continue to operate, but it confirmed that it's pulling out of New York and Chicago.

GM said in a prepared statement that it's not scrapping Maven, but rather concentrating on markets where it has the strongest demand and growth potential.

Maven, begun in 2016, allowed people to rent GM vehicles for short periods with an app.

GM vehicles were strategically placed in in metro areas including Denver; Los Angeles; Baltimore; San Francisco; Washington, D.C.; Toronto and others.

Maven later expanded to leases for ride-sharing drivers and added an app-based service that let owners of GM vehicles share their vehicles with others.

that nothing has changed. We cannot wait any longer for action."

Duckworth's office has been meeting with McDonald's for months to get updates and push the company to improve working conditions, said Duckworth spokesman Sean Savett.

McDonald's CEO Steve Easterbrook, in his letter to Duckworth on Monday, said the company started working last year with RAINN, a leading anti-sexual violence organization, to enhance its policies to more clearly define sexual harassment, provide examples of unacceptable behavior, and underscore how employees can report a complaint if they don't feel comfortable going to their manager. In the fall, it rolled out training, facilitated by a third party, on how to spot and prevent sexual harassment, and 90 percent of its corporate and franchise operators and general managers have taken it, he said.

McDonald's has 14,000 restaurants in the U.S., and 95 percent of them are franchises.

More initiatives will launch this summer, Easterbrook wrote. Starting in June the company will offer operators use of an anonymous hotline for reporting complaints, and in the next two months it will hold conversations with workers to further strengthen its policies and trainings. This August front-line staff will start receiving training during their shifts about harassment, unconscious bias and safety.

The Fight for $15 group, which is working with the American Civil Liberties Union and the Time's Up Legal Defense Fund, planned to announce the new complaints Tuesday during a protest outside McDonald's Fulton Market district headquarters that will feature TV host and activist Padma Lakshmi. Fifteen women are filing charges with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and five more are filing lawsuits in the courts.

The advocacy groups said they were unimpressed with McDonald's efforts to address the problem.

"The majority of our clients allege harassment occurring precisely when the company claims it was making these reforms, and we can find no one who has heard of a new policy or training initiative," Gillian Thomas, senior staff attorney for the ACLU Women's Rights Project, said in a news release from the Fight for $15 group. "The measures that McDonald's claims to have implemented, or to have in the works, are better than nothing, but the company has yet to commit to meting out consequences for stores, whether corporate-owned or franchised, where harassment continues to flourish."

Workers want mandatory training for managers and employees, enforcement of the zero-tolerance policy stated in employee handbooks and a sit-down meeting between workers and McDonald's to establish a plan, according to the news release. The movement, which is backed by the Service Employees International Union, has organized protests and strikes across the country since 2012 to put pressure on McDonald's and other fast-food companies to improve their pay and working conditions.

and Nevada.

States in the Midwest and along the East Coast are more populous than those out west, offering greater potential for long-term growth among cannabis companies, according to the report. Their marijuana programs have so far limited the number of licenses issued to operators. That has created a "fertile environment for scale and consolidation," and added value for big-time investors, according to the report.

Though some argue that the caps on licenses have kept out smaller operators, they have also given rise to about a dozen large, well-capitalized cannabis companies that operate in several states. Chicago-based companies like Green Thumb Industries, Grassroots and Cresco Labs are among the highest valued companies in the industry, according to the report.

"As these big players establish themselves in the medical marijuana markets in the East, we can expect to see explosive growth from scale once these states become legal recreational markets," according to the report.

Illinois' medical program has also expanded, adding more than 12,500 patients since February, when the state dropped fingerprint and background check requirements for patients, allowed people prescribed opioids access to medical marijuana, and started granting provisional access while medical card applications are reviewed.

The report's findings hinge on politics and other unforeseen factors. Lawmakers are already working to amend the Illinois bill, introduced earlier this month. Vermont remains the only state to legalize marijuana legislatively so far.

American said that until recently it never had a problem finding employees willing to work overtime.

The conflict is similar to one between Southwest Airlines and its mechanics, who are represented by the Aircraft Mechanics Fraternal Association. The airline sued union officials over an alleged illegal slowdown in that case too.

The two sides made up, however, after agreeing on a contract that gave workers 20% pay raises and bonuses. Negotiations lasted more than six years.

States' drone use rises as devices offer eye in the sky

By Lindsay Whitehurst
Associated Press

RICK BOWMER/AP

Travis White, of the Utah Department of Transportation, holds a drone at a demo Monday. Utah uses drones to monitor avalanches and spot potential mudslides.

SALT LAKE CITY — In Utah, drones are hovering near avalanches to watch roaring snow. In North Carolina, they're searching for the nests of endangered birds. In Kansas, they could soon be identifying sick cows through heat signatures.

Public transportation agencies are using drones in nearly every state, according to a new survey by the American Association of State Highway and Transportation Officials. The report released Monday finds a sharp increase in their use over the last few years, showing that governments as well as hobbyists have rapidly adopted the technology.

In 2016, the nonprofit group found no state transportation agency was using drones every day. Now, 36 states have certified drone pilots on staff. When the survey was done this month, all but one state was using drones in some way. Since then, the lone holdout — Rhode Island — has bought a drone, group spokesman Tony Dorsey said.

The small, unmanned aircraft are often used for mundane tasks, like inspecting bridges and roads. With sophisticated cameras and thermal technology, they can detect tiny cracks and identify potential potholes before they're visible to the human eye.

"You've seen the cost of drones come down significantly, and the capabilities that come along with some drones increase significantly as well," said the group's executive director, Jim Tymon.

Drones have raised privacy concerns, but Tymon said new technology lets them be programmed to avoid entering certain spaces.

Drones also have caused their share of headaches for officials over the years as personal devices forced the grounding of planes at airports or those fighting wildfires.

But they can be useful for work that's dangerous for people. In Utah, drones record from the air as state workers set off planned avalanches, allowing them to watch the slides close up in real time, said Jared Esselman, director of aeronautics at the state Department of Transportation.

Drones also can measure snow and other elements of the state's rugged terrain to keep them from blocking roads or other infrastructure.

"We can predict not only snow slides, but mudslides and water runoff as the snow melts," Esselman said. "Drones are a perfect tool for any job that is dangerous or dirty."

When a mudslide cut off access to a city about two years ago, Idaho sent a drone up to pinpoint the best spot to use heavy machinery to clear the road, said Brian Ness, director of the Idaho Transportation Department.

In North Carolina, drones are finding the nests of endangered species like the red-cockaded woodpecker, said Basil Yap, unmanned aerial systems program manager at the state's transportation department.

People used to fan out in helicopters or all-terrain vehicles to check for evidence of the protected birds before building new projects, but the drones can do the job quicker with less disruption, Yap said.

"There's little to no noise compared to a helicopter," he said.

They're also used to check for protected bats nesting under bridges and to spray herbicide on invasive plants near shorelines.

North Carolina is one of three states working with the Federal Aviation Administration to test drones beyond the operator's line of sight, at night and over people. The FAA does not usually allow those uses without a special waiver.

Also part of the program is Kansas, where workers use drones to create sophisticated farming programs and monitor cattle heat signatures to prevent any illnesses from spreading.

A number of states are beginning to explore how to regulate a flood of private drone traffic expected in the future. In Ohio, the state is working on an air-traffic control system called SkyVision, which would allow drones to detect and avoid other aircraft in flight.

OBITUARIES

BERNARD "BUD" FRANKEL 1929-2019

Marketing company founder helped develop Happy Meal

By Graydon Megan

Besides McDonald's, Bud Frankel's marketing services clients over the years included Citibank, Target, Microsoft, Nestle and UPS.

Bernard "Bud" Frankel helped other companies sell their products for 40 years as a co-founder in 1962 of what became marketing services business Frankel and Co., whose promotions included McDonald's Happy Meal.

"He was a pioneer in the industry," said Jim Mack, who was president of Frankel for 10 years and continued as president and CEO after the 2001 sale of the company to French advertising company Publicis Groupe. "He was really looked at as one of the founders of the sales promotion business. He took an industry that was primarily focused on displays and turned it into a marketing, branding and strategy agency."

Paul Schrage, former executive vice president and chief marketing officer at McDonald's, said Frankel's company was one of several that had a role in the Happy Meal program. "They were very much involved in putting the package together," he said. "You have to give them a lot of credit."

Frankel, 89, died of lung cancer on May 14 in his Gold Coast home, according to his wife, Mimi. The couple moved to Chicago from Evanston about 20 years ago.

Frankel was born in Cleveland and grew up in Buffalo, New York. He attended the University of Buffalo for a time and was working in sales for a men's sportswear company when he was transferred to Chicago.

He soon moved to Kling Studios, what his wife called an "old-time art studio," which produced art for advertising agencies. "Marketing and economics were always his passion," his wife said.

At Kling he met Marv Abelson. In 1962 the two started their own promotion agency, Abelson-Frankel. According to a company history, the growing business was an early promoter of "worthy cause" promotions with a campaign for Clark gum in which a small donation to charity was made for empty gum packages sent back to the company.

In 1973 the company began its relationship with McDonald's.

"We had an advertising agency, but because of the retail nature of our business, we needed help in the areas of local promotions and in-store displays," Schrage said.

Abelson-Frankel made a presentation and won the business. "We liked Bud very much and were very comfortable with him. That was the start," Schrage said.

"He was a visionary, he was incredibly smart, but he was also incredibly humanistic," said Dick Thomas, who joined Frankel in 1993 and succeeded Mack as CEO in the early 2000s. "He also knew he was only as good as the people that worked for him and the culture he created. Hiring the best-quality people ... and treating them well once they're in the door."

In 1976, Abelson-Frankel helped put together a promotion tied in with the 1976 Summer Olympics in Montreal. Customers received scratch-off game pieces for various events in a campaign called "When the U.S. wins, you win." If a U.S. athlete medaled in an event for which a customer had a game ticket, the ticket could be redeemed for food items — a Big Mac for gold, french fries for silver and a Coke for bronze.

"It woke people up to the idea that you could do more than hang a sign at a sporting event," said Colleen Fahey, former executive vice president and executive creative director with Frankel.

Fahey, who joined the company in the 1970s as a freelance copywriter, said it took time to establish a relationship with Bud Frankel.

"I think Bud needed to see you had integrity, that you were good to other people, that you could have ideas that could work in the real world and that could be measured," she said.

Fahey said Frankel's vision for the agency included a new approach to the way clients were charged, in place of the traditional system of commission on promotional products. "He wanted to charge professional fees for ideas and the execution of the ideas," Fahey said. "One thing that led to was always starting with a clean sheet of paper, a 'could-be-anything' idea."

The Happy Meal promotion began in 1979.

In 1981, Abelson left the company, which then became Frankel and Co. The company was recognized in 1989 by Advertising Age, now Ad Age, as sales promotion Agency of the Year.

In addition to McDonald's, clients over the years included Citibank, Target, Microsoft, Nestle and UPS.

Thomas said Frankel had a rare ability to create a vision, galvanize people behind that vision and get them moving together to realize it.

"Fearless, inventive and humanistic. Three words to describe Bud Frankel," Thomas said. "Once he was at the top of the mountain, he wasn't celebrating. ... He was looking for the next mountain."

In addition to his wife, Frankel is survived by sons Peter and Matthew, and 11 grandchildren. His daughter, Andrea Frankel Allen, died in 1995.

A memorial service will be held at 11 a.m. May 31 in Jewish Reconstructionist Congregation, 303 Dodge Ave., Evanston.

Holstein, Herman W

Herman Holstein, 92, of Oak Park, died peacefully at home from bladder cancer.

He will be remembered by sons Mark (Connie) Holstein, David (Cindy) Holstein of Mabank, TX, daughters Beth Holstein (Oliver Hemmann) and Carla Luttinen, his sister Mary Appelt of Appleton, WI, 12 grandchildren, and 7 great-grandchildren. He was preceded in death by his recently departed wife of 69 years, Hertha, parents Ernest and Bertha, and son-in-law Charles Luttinen.

Herman led an interesting life. He was born in Dearborn, Michigan and as a child he and his sister traveled to Germany to visit his mother's family. But with the outbreak of World War II, they were stranded abroad with his aunt and uncle. Toward the end of the war, his guardian angel told him it was time to leave Germany and safely led him across the border on foot to his father's home country of Switzerland. He returned to the United States after the war and worked as a butcher — a trade, he'd proudly note, that helped him feed and care for his family.

In 1989, Herman purchased land in Wisconsin and had a lake house built. Many family members and friends worked on any number of projects at the house. He shared the lake house with many and was the chief cook of the meat, offering guests snacks of sausage and cheese.

Herman was a devout man who was active in St. John Lutheran Church. Along with his wife, Hertha, he helped others feel the love of God through acts of service and volunteerism. He was a storyteller and a jokester who made so many laugh and smile. A hardworking man who never shied away from a project, he lovingly restored furniture to its former glory and constantly worked on the Oak Park house where he raised his family.

A joint visitation for Herman and Hertha will be held Thursday, May 23 at St. John Lutheran Church, 305 Circle Ave., Forest Park, Illinois from 10-11:30 a.m., followed by a funeral service at 11:30 a.m. officiated by Pastor Payton. Interment will be at 4 p.m. at Chapel Hill Gardens West Cemetery, 17W201 Roosevelt Rd., Oakbrook Terrace, Illinois.

Memorial gifts may be made to St. John Lutheran Church or Walther Christian Academy.

Fond godmother, aunt, and friend of many.

Bea was born to loving Irish immigrants, the late Richard and Mary Bridget Johnston on June 6, 1938 in Chicago, who taught her to value God, hard work, education, and family. Bea graduated from St. Clotilde Elementary School, Mercy High School and St. Xavier University. Devoted to her profession, Bea was a caring and compassionate Pediatric Nurse at The University of Chicago, Mercy Hospital, and the Chicago Board of Education.

Bea lived a life of faith that she instilled in all her family. She was an active parishioner of St. Francis Xavier in LaGrange, IL and St. William in Naples, FL, where she enjoyed being a Eucharistic minister to the homebound, volunteering at Immokalee Guadalupe Center, and attending daily mass with her faith families.

Raising her family was Bea's top priority, and she and Joe, the love of her life, did so with caring determination. Her seven children, their spouses, twenty grandchildren, and many nieces, nephews, and godchildren were the highlight of her life. Whether it was making family meals, cheering on her children and grandchildren at sporting events and activities, or hosting loved ones at their winter home in Naples, Bea was the devoted matriarch of her family who adored her. She truly will be missed.

Visitation will be Thursday, May 23, 2-9 pm, Hallowell & James Funeral Home, 1025 W. 55th St., Countryside. # Never too late: Cubs walk off

Score twice in bottom of 9th as Baez drives home winner

By Mark Gonzales
Chicago Tribune

The lack of clutch hitting left the Cubs bullpen with no margin for error, and it looked ominous Tuesday after Andrew McCutchen's two-out single in the seventh inning scored the tying and go-ahead runs as the Phillies took a 2-1 lead heading into the bottom of the ninth at chilly Wrigley Field.

But the Cubs offense, which was 0-for-8 with runners in scoring position and had stranded 12 runners, came alive in the bottom of the ninth for a 3-2 victory.

Kris Bryant led off with a walk and moved to third on a double by Anthony Rizzo off Juan Nicasio. With one out, Jason Heyward was intentionally walked.

Albert Almora Jr. then hit a dribbler in front of the mound that Nicasio charged but lobbed home too late to get a force play on Bryant as the tying run scored.

An untimely malfunction in the old center-field scoreboard wasn't a high priority during Monday's Yu Darvish-Jake Arrieta matchup at Wrigley Field.

Fans sitting near me down the first-base line barely seemed to notice the board was out for the first few innings, and it certainly didn't matter to fans watching on TV, which updates balls and strikes instantly.

Smaller graphics boards hanging off the facade of the upper deck had the pertinent information, in case anyone was interested in the count. Radar readings and pitch counts were always on display on the larger video boards in left and right field.

And there's always your cell phone if you need a quick statistical fix.

It wasn't as though anyone was denied his or her Wrigley experience, and the actual game was, as Arrieta attested,

Gene Honda's email accounts are not linked to his phone, and he's not on Twitter. Hang with him for a night and you might never see his face aglow in the mobile reflection.

Honda is a social animal who survives on bar trivia, self-deprecating quips, belly laughs, Salem Ultra Lights and sporting events. So many sporting events.

His schedule is relentless: He is the public-address announcer for the White Sox, Blackhawks, Illinois football, DePaul basketball, the Final Four, the Big Ten men's basketball tournament, the Maui Invitational, the Chicago Marathon and ... wait, what are we forgetting?

Oh, yeah. He plans to spend his 65th birthday announcing a flag football tournament in Houston.

How many nights a year does he work?

"According to my bank account," he shoots back, "not enough."

It's a Monday and Honda is grabbing dinner with colleagues before the Sox game. He tells stories about the original pronunciation of Ozzie Guillen's last name (it contained a "j" sound) and having introduced Michael Jordan at Chicago Stadium while pinch hitting for Tommy Edwards.

Someone at the table mentions that the

Bears want fans to see it live

Forget about a red carpet for past and present players, coaches and others of importance arriving at next month's Bears100 Celebration Weekend in Rosemont.

The carpet leading into the Donald E. Stephens Convention Center's VIP entrance will be orange. Bears orange.

In place of the fashion police or Ryan Seacrest, there to greet them June 7 will be Lou Canellis, host of a live one-hour Fox-32 special.

And why not?

The surprise isn't that WFLD is marshaling its resources to present the "Live From the Orange Carpet" special from outside the fan fest. It's that it's not doing more.

But the Bears have set out to make this three-day event chiefly a first-person fan experience.

While there will be panel discussions that will be recorded and almost certainly find their way into the team's multiplatform content, on Fox-32 and elsewhere, much of the attractions for the paying attendees involve interactivity, autographs and photo opportunities.

If there were a chance to do more, it's hard to imagine Channel 32 saying no.

Bears programming is "our most important product, along with local news," said Fox-32 boss Dennis Welsh. "It's critical to our station."

Welsh runs three hours of Bears programming per week during football season, not counting games it airs, in his station's role as the Bears' official TV partner. That's a contractual distinction it has held for 12 years now, with three years remaining on its current deal.

But as far as most fans are concerned, Channel 32 has been the Bears' station since parent Fox scored its first NFL package of games 25 years ago, making it home for most of the team's regular-season and postseason telecasts.

"When people think Bears football, more times than not they're going to think Fox," said Scott Hagel, the Bears' senior vice president of marketing and communications. "We want to leverage that locally and create that habit of when there's Bears football information, as it relates to television, we want people to think of WFLD.

"No matter what your flavor of Bears (programming) is, we want it easily found in one space, and it's free over-the-air television. So in a world where there's cord-cutting and other types of things, it's still easily accessible and it's in one spot."

But the Bears100 Celebration Weekend is not primarily a media marketing play. There's a big book coming out next month from Tribune alumni Don Pierson and Dan Pompei and other projects for that.

The fan convention is a chance to engage several thousand fans and bring decades of players and tradition together. Other teams, such as the Cubs, White Sox and Blackhawks, stage annual affairs. The Bears have held out for a centennial celebration.

CHRIS SWEDA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

"We want people to come and experience it," Hagel said. "Football is about camaraderie, and our fan base tells us they like to celebrate with other Bears fans.

"Some of these panels should be unbelievable and would be great television, but it's about being in the room with the fans and (current and former Bears) and experiencing that in real time. We want people to feel a part of this event."

Beyond autographs and photograph sessions, there will be a full-size artificial-turf field and the chance to try NFL draft combine drills and other challenges.

Fox is loaning out the mobile set for its NFL pregame, halftime and postgame desk coverage — the same one that will be used at the NFC championship and Super Bowl LIV — so attendees can sit behind it or stand in front for pictures.

And here's a travel tip: June 7-9 is a bad time to visit the Pro Football Hall of Fame in Canton, Ohio. All 28 of the busts representing Bears enshrinees will be in Rosemont.

"It's the first time ever that Canton has let this many busts leave the facility," Hagel said. "It's once in a lifetime, very special, very unique. We want to produce those sorts of rare opportunities and give our fan base something where they say, 'Man, you've got to be there.' "

As is, Welsh said that compared with any team in any sport in the Chicago market, the Bears "have the largest fan base and the biggest connection."

Yet the Bears have been marketing more aggressively lately, even as their on-field product improves under coach Matt Nagy and general manager Ryan Pace.

The team is getting smarter about how it uses social media, website and TV platforms.

It has re-signed ESPN's hard-working and fast-rising Adam Amin to call preseason games with former quarterback Jim Miller.

Plus the team just cut a deal to share those telecasts with Tribune Media's KPLR-TV in St. Louis, a city bereft of a hometown NFL franchise to back since the Rams bolted for Los Angeles after the 2015 season.

"What we're learning, and sports teams in general are learning, is we have to be where our fan base is," Hagel said. "The expectation that you just put something out there and that they just come to it, those days are over."

Sometimes that means offering a deeper dive or a behind-the-scenes look via the team's official TV partner. Other times it means greeting people just before they go inside.

CHRIS SWEDA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Wrigley Field's hand-operated center-field scoreboard might not be truly necessary anymore, but real fans would miss it if it were gone.

With board off, we see how much we'd miss it

about as exciting as anyone could ask for.

Still, if you've spent a lifetime glancing out toward center field after pitches and 30-plus years watching scoreboard operator Rick Fuhs control the vintage console — registering balls, strikes, outs, uniform numbers and whether a play was scored a hit ("H") or error ("E") — it made you realize how much you would miss the old behemoth if it was gone.

It may be relatively useless in this era, with the exception of helping one brush up on math skills while adding up out-of-town scores, but it's still the ballpark equivalent to comfort food for some of us admitted dinosaurs.

We don't have to worry about its demise, thankfully. The hand-operated center-field scoreboard, erected in 1937 when the bleachers were rebuilt and ivy was first planted on the brick walls, maintains landmark status.

That means it's protected from whatever whim the Cubs owners may have down the road in their ongoing effort to monetize every square inch of Wrigley. (Not that they ever would dare to mess with tradition, of course, even if they could.)

Fortunately the Cubs responded quickly after the scoreboard malfunction was spotted. An engineer was summoned to the press box in the first inning and opened a panel that contained a typical breaker box you would find at Home Depot, connecting the console wiring to the old scoreboard.

Fuhs, known as "Quick Rick" for his ability to post balls and strikes nanoseconds after the plate umpire makes the call, was back in business by the third inning or so.

After the scoreboard issue was fixed, the only matter left was turning on the press-box heat, a problem relayed to the Cubs but placed on the back burner for the night. The heat was working again Tuesday.

The press box will be the last major part of the Wrigley renovation, and though nothing has been announced, a Cubs source said they expect it to begin next offseason. We inhabitants aren't holding our breath, though some of us are holding onto duct tape and sealing the press-box windows where cold air sneaks in.

Despite the long-running "restoration" of Wrigley, the Cubs have always been in denial about their press-box issues. One honcho once told reporters they would slap a new coat of paint on it as an offseason renovation, a slap in the face to those who work there.

Because the press box is owned by the Cubs but inhabited mostly by the press, its renovation is low on the to-do list, even though team employees, including Fuhs, have permanent seats there. One Cubs employee wore a stocking cap Monday night, either because he was cold or in solidarity with media members already accustomed to brain freeze, though not the literal kind.

Press-box griping and scoreboard malfunctions aside, the Wrigley renovation has been a critical success with most people, including media members allowed to see the changes up close.

Opposing players and managers have been the biggest admirers, and a recurring scene this season has been the visiting manager welcoming media into his new office overlooking Sheffield and Addison and lauding the Cubs for the clubhouse makeover.

"They did do a phenomenal job," Phillies manager Gabe Kapler raved before Monday's game. "This entire ballpark, every time I come back here, it looks better and better. More amenities. ... The Cubs really kicked ass on this project, and it still feels like Wrigley, like you never lose any of the old feel. They killed it."

The Dodgers' Dave Roberts, Pirates' Clint Hurdle, Angels' Brad Ausmus and other managers also delivered thumbs up. It took a while, but the Cubs did it right.

But as much as Wrigley changes, the things that remain the same — the "old feel" — are the reasons it's on so many fans' bucket lists.

The ivy is coming in nicely, better late than never, which can only mean summer is going to happen. And the old scoreboard was working Tuesday night as the Cubs and Phillies met again in a potential playoff preview.

It may be an anachronism, sure, but it's our anachronism.

ASK THE REPORTER
MARK GONZALES

Jason Heyward is now batting .243 after hitting .329 on May 1. Time to bench him. These guys have a hard time against left-handed pitching. — Bob O.

In spring training, Heyward talked about the challenge of not facing many left-handed starters and then having to face tough left-handed relievers in late-inning situations.

As for the team, through Sunday, they were batting .236 against lefties and .260 against righties.

I was a little puzzled they didn't do better against the Brewers lefty Gio Gonzalez, but maybe I wasn't giving Gonzalez enough credit. He threw 200 innings in 2017 and did an exceptional job of working the corners against the Cubs.

Pitchers such as Gonzalez have a better chance to help any team trying to win rather than using kids at the back of the rotation who clearly need more seasoning in the minors. I don't understand why teams aren't willing to spend $5 million or less on a veteran starter but more willing to risk the development of a pitching prospect by rushing him to the majors when he's clearly not ready.

Thursday night against the Reds, Willson Contreras made no attempt to block two pitches in the fifth inning. These were pitches a major-league catcher should be expected to block, and they would have held the runners at first and second and/or would have resulted in only one of those runners scoring from second on the hit by Eugenio Suarez and the game being tied at 2 instead of trailing at the end of the fifth. Is it acceptable for a major-league catcher to not even make an attempt to block pitches with runners on base and most importantly on third base? And if not, should Joe Maddon use his hands-on approach (as an ex-catcher) to shake this particular fundamental into his All-Star catcher? — Jim K.

Contreras' defense always is going to be questioned. But on the first wild pitch, Jose Quintana said he slipped before delivering. The conditions were pretty miserable. Sorry if this sounds like an excuse, but those combinations made it tough. I don't think it's a bad idea for Maddon to get involved, but he doesn't like to meddle too much in his coaches' responsibilities. Mike Borzello is in constant contact with Contreras.

Arrieta applauds fans' ovation

Appreciative ex-Cub 'can't say thank you enough' to Chicago

By Paul Sullivan
Chicago Tribune

Jake Arrieta had a job to do Monday night at Wrigley Field, so any thought of hobnobbing with his former Cubs teammates before the game was out of the question.

"I really wasn't as social as I will be (Tuesday) and the next couple days," Arrieta said after the Phillies' 5-4 win in 10 innings. "I'll catch up with a lot of them.

"I thought it was funny. I saw (Kyle) Schwarber's quote, how he was going to greet me when he was in the box. I thought that was pretty funny. It was pretty cool to face these guys."

Arrieta pitched well in his first outing against the team he helped win a World Series in 2016, allowing one run in six innings, but he didn't get the win.

He did say something to Anthony Rizzo walking to the dugout after inducing a first-inning groundout against his old friend.

"I guess he won the matchup; he got a couple knocks," Arrieta said. "He's a really tough out, especially when you fall behind the count.

"I'm happy for him. I know they're not excited about the way the game turned out, but they played a hell of a game too."

Arrieta was at Wrigley Field last year and the Cubs treated him to a tribute video, but he didn't pitch in the series. So when he came to the plate in the third inning and received a standing ovation, the gesture meant a lot.

"That was something that really brought back memories of getting that same sort of ovation pretty much on a nightly basis," he said. "Very appreciative of that and I can't say thank you enough to the city of Chicago. I really can't, but I'll do my best."

Arrieta said he has learned to appreciate his relationship with the fans in Chicago even more as time has passed.

"I do, and the longer I'm kind of away from it, the more I appreciate it," he said. "In the moment it's not necessarily tough to appreciate it, but you're able to reflect a little bit deeper (now), and as time goes by, you put a little more thought into it and it really sinks in.

"What we were able to do here as a team, as an organization and the strides we took to get to where we were, I'm proud of all those guys over there still and I wish them all the best."

Facing Yu Darvish, who basically replaced Arrieta in the rotation, was a story from a "fan and media perspective," Arrieta said. To him, all that mattered was facing the Cubs.

"As soon as I went out there, it was just kind of like any start," he said.

But it wasn't just any other start, and the Phillies badly wanted to reward him in his return to Wrigley.

"That's what it's all about," outfielder Bryce Harper said. "I thought he came in really happy, really fired up to pitch here again. We definitely wanted to give him that 'W' today. We tried our best to do that. We couldn't do that, but we're fortunate to get a 'W.' "

It turned out to be a crazy game, with the Cubs taking a late lead on Daniel Descalso's three-run "Little League home run" — a triple and an error — before the Cubs bullpen gave it back.

"Both teams showed multiple signs of why we're leading our divisions," Arrieta said. "Tough outs top to bottom in that lineup. They made me work out of trouble in several of the innings.

"Harper throwing Rizzo out at the plate in the fifth inning, maybe the biggest play of the game. Tough to say, but this was a really good ballgame between two really good teams."

But in the end, Arrieta said he would remember the way Cubs fans embraced him.

"It was something I experienced pretty much from day one here with the fan base," he said. "Cubs fans all across the country, all across the world, they really respect and appreciate what guys are able to do here for them.

"It means a lot, it really does. I'll never forget this city, this fan base, this organization, everything they did for me. It was 4½ incredible years of my career."

Todd Frazier is held back by Mets teammates as he and the Nationals' Adam Eaton have a heated discussionat Citi Field on Monday.

Frazier, Eaton continue feuding

Former Sox players engage in another verbal joust Monday

By Mike Fitzpatrick
Associated Press

NEW YORK — So much for burying the hatchet.

Mets third baseman Todd Frazier and Nationals outfielder Adam Eaton — who were teammates with the White Sox in 2016 — had a heated exchange between innings that a television camera caught Monday night at Citi Field.

The players jawed at each other from a distance in the middle of the third inning, prompting several Nationals to take a few steps out of the dugout. First-base umpire Mike Estabrook stepped in front of Eaton and a teammate restrained Frazier just outside the Mets dugout. Eaton took his position in right field while Frazier was led back to the Mets bench on the first-base side.

The two have an acrimonious history, apparently dating to their Sox days. They similarly yelled across the infield during a game in August 2018, according to the Washington Post.

"Gosh, who knows what goes through that guy's mind?" Eaton said after the Mets' 5-3 victory Monday. "He's chirping all the way across the infield.

"He must really like me because he wants to get my attention it seems like every time we come here to town. He really cares what I think about him, I guess. I don't know what the deal is.

"You've got to be a man at some point, so I turned around (and) had a few choice words with him. It's funny — I was walking toward him and he didn't really want to walk toward me, but as soon as someone held him back, then he all of a sudden was really impatient, like (he was) trying to come toward me."

Eaton acknowledged he's surprised their beef is still going on.

After the game, Frazier downplayed the incident, saying only: "That was nothing at all."

But when reporters pressed him about the incident before Game 2 of the series Tuesday, he didn't hold back.

"That's him," Frazier told reporters. "When you think about what a man really is, you settle stuff out in the field. You don't really talk about it. That's basically what I do."

Baez does not start — but does he finish!

By Mark Gonzales
Chicago Tribune

Javier Baez missed his second consecutive start Tuesday night because of a bruised right heel, but he was able to pinch hit in the ninth inning and won the game for the Cubs with an RBI single on the first pitch he saw.

The hit drove in Anthony Rizzo for a 3-2 Cubs win over the Phillies at Wrigley Field.

With Baez out of the starting lineup, manager Joe Maddon prefers to keep the rest of his lineup firm with Kris Bryant and Anthony Rizzo in the second and third spots.

"I haven't thought about changing it yet," Maddon said. "I like the way it looks right now."

Bryant batted in the second spot for the 45th time Tuesday and Rizzo third for the 42nd time. Those are the only spots they've batted in this season.

"Theoretically, Rizzo is going to get on base more often than Javy is," Maddon said. "Javy has the flair for what he does on a daily basis. So I think Javy's talents blend to not necessarily need the protection that a Rizzo's talents lend to. That's just my opinion."

The decision to sit Baez occurred during Monday's game, Maddon said.

"He kept using the word 'sore,' and I just want to make sure that's all it is," said Maddon, who was under the assumption Baez would undergo more tests to rule out any other ailments.

Sympathy for the umpire: Rizzo lent support to umpire Hunter Wendelstedt in the wake of Wendelstedt's ruling in the ninth inning Monday that the Phillies' Andrew McCutchen checked his swing, wiping out what would have been a game-ending strikeout and allowing McCutchen to eventually draw a walk and set up the tying single by Jean Segura.

"Hunter is one of the best in the business," Rizzo said. "He's engaged in every pitch. He's a great guy. He's a great umpire, so I really don't question what he does."

Rizzo said he's not in favor of an electrical device to determine whether a batter swung, an idea Maddon endorses.

"Absolutely not," Rizzo said in a firm tone.

Hold the hype: This marks one of the more low-key visits to Wrigley Field by Bryce Harper, who signed a 13-year, $330 million contract with the Phillies after much unfounded speculation that he was destined for the Cubs.

"There's way more attention on Jake (Arrieta) and Yu (Darvish)," said Kris Bryant, a longtime friend of Harper from their Las Vegas days.

"He's swinging it better lately. I saw a couple of home runs. I love competing against him. It takes me back to when we were 8-10 years old."

Harper entered Tuesday's game reaching base safely in all 18 games he played at Wrigley, and his .512 on-base percentage at Wrigley is tops among all players with at least 80 plate appearances.

Javier Baez is swarmed by teammates after his game-winning single Tuesday night against the Phillies.

CUBS RECAP

Javier Baez delivered a pinch-hit single with the bases loaded and one out in the ninth inning, giving the Cubs a 3-2 win against the Phillies on Tuesday night at Wrigley Field.

The Cubs started the inning behind 2-1. Kris Bryant led off with a walk and moved to third on a double by Anthony Rizzo off Phillies reliever Juan Nicasio. With one out, Jason Heyward was intentionally walked to load the bases. Albert Almora Jr. hit a dribbler in front of the mound that Nicasio charged but lobbed home too late to force out Bryant, who scored the tying run. Andrew McCutchen's two-out single in the seventh scored the tying and go-ahead runs. Bryant scored the Cubs' first run when he ran home from second base on a grounder to shortstop in the first. Jose Quintana pitched six scoreless innings, allowing two hits and three walks while striking out four. Kyle Ryan (1-1) got the final two outs of the eighth inning, stranding a runner at second base.

bruise, came off the bench to hit a single to right for the game-winning hit.

Bryant provided the first run when he scored from second base on a grounder to shortstop in the first. The Cubs went on to load the bases but didn't score.

That set the tone on a miserable night in which they nearly wasted six scoreless innings by Jose Quintana.

In the seventh, Carl Edwards Jr. allowed a single to Cesar Hernandez and a one-out double by Maikel Franco that sailed well over the head of Kyle Schwarber in left.

With two out, manager Joe Maddon summoned Brandon Kintzler, who had stranded 12 of the 13 runners he inherited.

But McCutchen singled up the middle to wipe out the Cubs' lead.

The Cubs also lost a run on a review in the second. With two out, Bryant hit a double down the left-field line that enabled Schwarber to score from first. But Phillies manager Gabe Kapler asked for a review, and replays showed the ball left the field of play, forcing Schwarber to return to third.

Rizzo flied to center to end the inning.

WHITE SOX RECAP

Justin Verlander took a no-hitter into the seventh inning before Jose Abreu broke it up with a solo home run to center field with one out. That was the only hit the White Sox managed Tuesday night in their 5-1 loss to the Astros in Houston. Dylan Covey (above, 0-3) allowed four earned runs in four-plus innings. He allowed only Yuli Gurriel's solo homer through four innings, then walked the first two batters in the fifth before departing two pitches into an at-bat against Josh Reddick, who finished his walk to load the bases against Aaron Bummer. The Astros scored four runs in the fifth, with three charged to Covey. Verlander (8-1) allowed one walk while striking out a season-high 12. ## Canha HR lifts red-hot A's

Associated Press

CLEVELAND — Pinch-hitter Mark Canha's two-run homer off struggling Indians starter Trevor Bauer in the third inning sent the Athletics to their fifth straight win, 5-3 over the Indians on Tuesday night.

Canha replaced injured slugger Khris Davis and connected off Bauer (4-3), who managed to hang around for six innings despite early wildness. The right-hander is winless since April 30 and his outings have become more concerning. The Indians were hoping for more while waiting for injured starters Corey Kluber and Mike Clevinger to return.

Bauer walked four, struck out five and hit three while throwing a season-high 123 pitches.

Oakland reliever Liam Hendricks (2-0) pitched two scoreless innings and Blake Treinen, the A's fourth reliever, worked the ninth for his ninth save in 11 tries.

Davis, who entered with 12 homers, has been slowed by a bruised left hip sustained on May 5 in Pittsburgh.

Jurickson Profar homered in the eighth as Oakland improved to 7-1 against AL Central teams this season. The A's are 59-20 vs. Cleveland, Chicago, Minnesota, Detroit and Kansas City dating to Aug. 23, 2016.

Francisco Lindor and Carlos Santana hit solo homers for Cleveland.

With Bauer struggling to find his rhythm, Canha hit his third career pinch-homer to give the A's a 3-1 lead in the third.

Batting for Davis, Canha fell behind 1-2 before reaching out of the strike zone to push a fastball over the wall in right.

AROUND THE HORN

■ Rangers: RHP Shawn Kelley, 35, learned that two lumps removed from his throat last week were benign, and he was activated from the 10-day injured list. ... SS Elvis Andrus and OF Scott Heineman were sent to Double-A Frisco for rehab assignments.

■ Brewers: NL MVP Christian Yelich was scratched from the lineup before a 3-0 loss to the Reds because of back spasms. Yelich leads the major leagues with 19 home runs and is batting .325 with 41 RBIs in 44 games, including 42 starts. He has missed parts of seven games because of back problems.

■ Astros: Justin Verlander allowed one hit over eight innings and struck out 12 in a 5-1 win over the White Sox. His no-hitter was broken up with one out in the seventh on a home run by Jose Abreu.

■ Dodgers: Clayton Kershaw took a shutout into the seventh inning in a 7-3 win over the Rays. The three-time NL Cy Young Award winner allowed two runs, six hits, one walk and had eight strikeouts in 6 1/3 innings. ... RHP Julio Urias was reinstated from administrative leave by MLB. Urias was placed on leave while MLB officials looked into his May 13 arrest for investigation of misdemeanor domestic battery.

■ Rockies: German Marquez struck out seven over eight dominant innings, Trevor Story hit his 11th home run as the Rockies beat the Pirates 5-0, snapping a four-game losing streak.

■ Angels: SS Andrelton Simmons landed on the injured list after he sprained his left ankle during a loss to the Twins. He suffered a grade 3 ankle sprain when he tried to beat out an infield hit during the eighth inning. INF Luis Rengifo was recalled from Triple-A Salt Lake. ... DH Shohei Ohtani was hit in the right ring finger while swinging on a third strike Monday but was in the lineup Tuesday.

■ Mariners: The team placed 2B Dee Gordon (wrist) and 3B Ryon Healy (back) on the 10-day injured list and signed RHP Anthony Bass to a one-year contract with a $950,000 salary while in the major leagues.

■ Mets: Pete Alonso hit a long tying home run in the eighth inning, Amed Rosario had a winning infield single with two outs in the ninth as the Mets rallied from deficits three times to beat the Nationals 6-5.

■ Blue Jays: Rowdy Tellez had two homers and five RBIs in a 10-3 victory over the Red Sox.

■ Extra innings: The traditional rivalry between the Yankees and Red Sox will take a radical twist when they meet in London on June 29-30: They will play on artificial turf for the first time in more than 2,200 games over a century. Starting June 6, gravel will be placed over the covering protecting West Ham's grass soccer pitch and the running track that is a legacy from the 2012 Olympics. The artificial turf baseball field will be installed atop that. ... The opener of the I-70 series between the Cardinals and the Royals was postponed because of a forecast for severe weather in St. Louis and rescheduled as part of a day-night doubleheader on Wednesday.

Raptors tie East finals 2-2

Associated Press

TORONTO — Kyle Lowry scored 25 points, Kawhi Leonard had 19 and the Raptors beat the Bucks 120-102 on Tuesday night to even the Eastern Conference finals at two games apiece.

Serge Ibaka had 17 points and 13 rebounds for the Raptors, who improved to 7-2 at home this postseason. Reserve Norm Powell scored 18 points, and Marc Gasol had 17.

The home team has won all four games in the series so far. Game 5 is Thursday night in Milwaukee.

Giannis Antetokounmpo had 25 points and 10 rebounds for the top-seeded Bucks. Khris Middleton scored 30 points.

The Bucks lost their second straight following a six-game winning streak. They dropped consecutive games just once during the regular season, at Utah on March 2 and at Phoenix on March 4.

The Raptors' Fred VanVleet, who missed 16 of 20 shot attempts through the first three games of the series, went 5-for-6 from the field in Game 4. He made each of his three 3-point tries and finished with 13 points.

Ahead 94-81 to start the fourth, the Raptors extended their lead with a 10-3 spurt, including seven points from VanVleet. Powell's fast-break layup with 8:35 left put the Raptors up 104-84.

Antetokounmpo shot 5-for-8 in the opening frame, matching the number of made baskets he had during the Bucks' double-overtime loss in Game 3. However, the Bucks star went 4-for-9 the rest of the way.

Leonard missed three of his four attempts in the first but Lowry scored 12 points for the Raptors, who rallied from an early seven-point deficit to lead 32-31 after one.

After scoring the final four points of the first quarter, the Raptors widened their lead with a 9-0 run to begin the second. Ibaka's dunk with 9:56 to go gave Toronto a 41-31 lead.

STANLEY CUP PLAYOFFS

Blues make 1st Final since 1970

Associated Press

ST. LOUIS — The Blues are marching into the Stanley Cup Final for the first time in decades.

David Perron had a goal and an assist, Jordan Binnington picked up his franchise-record 12th playoff win and the Blues beat the Sharks 5-1 in Game 6 of the Western Conference finals Tuesday night.

Vladimir Tarasenko, Brayden Schenn and Tyler Bozak also scored for the Blues, who will face the Bruins for the championship. Ryan O'Reilly had three assists, and Binnington stopped 25 shots.

The Blues won four consecutive games to advance to the franchise's first Cup Final since 1970. That series also pitted the Blues against the Bruins.

Laura Branigan's "Gloria" blared over the speakers at the Blues' home arena after the latest victory on an improbable run from last in the NHL Jan. 3 to one of the last two teams standing. The turnaround came after Craig Berube replaced Mike Yeo as coach in November and Binnington took over as the starting goaltender in January.

San Jose played without injured forwards Joe Pavelski and Tomas Hertl and defenseman Erik Karlsson. Injury attrition played a role for the Sharks, who played seven games in each of the first two rounds.

Keeping sharp: The Bruins think they've found a way to stay sharp for the Stanley Cup Final while waiting a total of 10 days between games.

The Eastern Conference champions will hold a public intrasquad scrimmage on Thursday night, and coach Bruce Cassidy said he'll try to maintain a regular game-day schedule so that the players will get back in the routine before the opener of the championship series on Monday.

"We've got some ideas we bandied around. We came up with this one," Cassidy said on Tuesday, the Bruins' fifth day off since sweeping the Hurricanes in the East finals. "We've had good practices, but this will be a little bit different."

The Bruins had either just one or two days off before starting their previous two series.

Gene Honda in a White Sox cap at easy-listening WLIT-FM in 1991. "Barry Manilow helped pay for my first car," he said.

Honda's got games

NBA draft lottery is the next night, and it's being held downtown.

"You mean it's in Chicago and you're not hosting it?" Dave Marran jokes.

Marran, a stats maven for scoreboard operations, was at Old Comiskey Park for Honda's first day on the job in 1985.

"Gene kind of raised me," Marran says, "and showed me how to be a professional."

"A professional what?" Honda replies.

At his essence, Honda is a man who takes his job(s) seriously — but not himself.

He is unwavering in his commitment to pronounce every name correctly, whether it's Europeans on the ice, Kenyans on the asphalt or Latinos on the diamond.

During the Big Ten basketball tournament at the United Center, he reeled off Illinois' Giorgi Bezhanishvili as easily as Northwestern's Vic Law.

"He's a professional," says Melanie Murphy, who creates scoreboard graphics. "For as animated and funny as he is, he doesn't let the emotions affect the job. And he's not just a reader, he's a content editor who's able to fix and correct copy. He's the best. Not by a little, by a lot."

'Geography and I do not get along'

It's trivia night at Will's Northwoods Inn, a woodsy-themed Packers bar in Lakeview. Honda first came here for a New Year's Eve party thrown by former Blackhawks center John Madden. Now the bar with a stuffed moose head on display supplies his Tuesday night fix of Miller Lites and brain calisthenics.

Teams of up to eight compete for free rounds of drinks and gift cards, promising not to use technology to cheat. Honda welcomes basically anyone to his team, with the caveat he or she must try to contribute.

Is he any good?

"Depends on the category," Honda says. "Geography and I do not get along."

There is a lot he knows, though, starting with his home city. Honda was born at Illinois Masonic and raised in Andersonville before attending Senn High School and heading to the University of Illinois in 1972.

His father, Ben, an architect, envisioned him becoming an engineer, saying his son wasn't creative enough for other fields. Gene switched from math to finance before discovering his passion after noticing an ad for a DJ at the campus radio station, WPGU.

"My dad's advice was to learn how to speak in public," he recalls. "I told my cousin: 'Let's do it to meet girls.' Well, I batted .500."

He hits better at trivia.

"We usually just wait for him to come up with the answer," says Courtney Wheaton of the White Sox Pride Crew. "He's one of the smartest guys I've ever met. Keeps us on our toes."

Honda studied at Illinois long enough, he's fond of saying, to span four administrations — from Nixon to Reagan. When he finally got out, he deejayed at Chicago's WLAK-FM, which is now WLIT-FM.

"Barry Manilow helped pay for my first car," he says.

The first question of the evening: In 1946, this telecommunications engineering corporation was formed in Tokyo. What is it known as today?

"I want to say Toshiba," Honda says to his teammates. "Yamaha didn't get into music until the 1960s."

Finally he settles on his answer: Sony.

It's correct.

"Thank you, Mother," the Japanese American Honda says with a smirk.

(Later, upon finding out he's the only "Game of Thrones" devotee at the table, he says: "That's OK. I'm used to being a minority.")

ERIN HOOLEY/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

"There's nothing more offensive to anyone in any situation than mispronouncing their name."
— Gene Honda

Wine is produced from which fruit that contains a glossy, red skin?

Everyone looks at one another. It has to be grapes, right?

Honda mentions apples, adding: "You can make wine out of anything."

Apples is correct.

Our team ranks in the middle of the pack, whiffing on the final question: Which resolution did Congress pass in 1964 as a result of North Vietnamese aggression?

Honda is stumped: "I'm gonna hate myself."

The answer: The Gulf of Tonkin.

Womp, womp.

If it's any consolation, the defeat can't touch his Blackhawks status. See that mini-trophy on his right hand? It's a 2015 Blackhawks Stanley Cup championship ring.

Honda even won over his dad, though it took a while. Some 20 years after his initial comment, he told Gene: "I'm glad you found something you can be creative with."

Gene replied: "Dad, don't do that while I'm driving."

He says now: "There was a pool of liquid at my feet."

And he laughs loud enough to register on the Richter scale.

'He has perfected the craft'

The man who famously bellowed, "FRRRRRRRANK THOMAS!" and "ROBIN VEN-TURA!" is preparing for the May 13 Indians-Sox game.

Baseball Reference and The Name Engine provide some help with names, as do the teams that make pronunciation guides. Indians right fielder Jordan Luplow, for example, pronounces it "LOOP-low."

Short of that, Honda will simply ask the player what he prefers. During spring training, Sox outfielder Eloy Jimenez said he has no preference.

But Honda does.

"It's AH-loy Him-EN-ez," he says. "We have radio people calling him EE-loy."

Honda is readying for outfield prospect Luis Robert. Most pronounce his last name as if it comes before De Niro. Honda says it should sound like "ROH-burr."

He remembers when the Sox traded for Guillen before the 1985 season. The rookie shortstop told Honda and Bob Costas that his name is pronounced with hard G and J sounds: GEE-jen.

"A few weeks later PR said, 'We're calling him Guillen, like Manny Sanguillen.' I said, 'OK.' "

(Side note: Guillen once ribbed Albert Belle, asking why he no longer went by "Joey." Belle replied that Guillen should be introduced as "Oswaldo." Word got to Honda. So one time you went to the park, you might have heard: "Batting ninth, Oswaldo Guillen.")

Honda's toughest gig was calling the 1988 Olympic boxing trials at the UIC Pavilion — 600-some pugilists from more than 100 countries.

A Sox game might not be as challenging, especially for a man who has done thousands of them. But Honda sometimes has to tweak or omit promotional copy on the fly without stumbling. In some ways, Honda is most appreciated when he's not there because of a scheduling conflict. (A Hawks playoff game trumps all, followed by an Illini football game because there are so few.)

"He has a great voice, but there's so much more to it," says Chris Ackels, an in-game Sox host/emcee. "He has perfected the craft, the cadence. It's timing, knowing the fans, knowing the game. It's one, informing, and two, creating a fun environment."

It starts with getting every name right, from those selected to throw the ceremonial first pitch to the players to the military "Heroes of the Game."

"There's nothing more offensive to anyone in any situation than mispronouncing their name," Honda says. "It's one shot — and you have to get it right."

At 6:40 p.m., the stadium announcements begin. At 7:08, Honda bellows: "Sox fans, ON YOUR FEET for your 2019 Chicago White Sox!"

After fireworks go off, Honda announces Indians leadoff man Francisco Lindor and then walks around Broadcast Booth 1, shaking hands with the four others involved in game presentation and video production.

"Have a good game," he says. "Welcome to the party."

Lindor clobbers the third pitch down the right-field line, a blast of 435 feet into the new Goose Island space.

"Wow," Honda says off mic. "That almost hit the goose. Is there a prize for that? Goose almost went on the endangered species list."

Honda is perched on an $87 seat cushion and uses binoculars to peer into the bullpen. He can take a bathroom break only during a pitching change and a smoke break only during a rain delay.

He began his pack-a-day habit, he says, "when I was studying in summer school the same day I started at the radio station. I was trying to stay up late and the coffee wasn't working."

Have the smokes contributed to his velvety voice?

"Well, that and the Scotch," he replies.

The game ends in a tidy 2 hours, 28 minutes, giving Honda bonus time to ponder his upcoming schedule. Outside the ballpark he lights a cigarette with a black Sox Zippo. He'll be back in the booth in about 12 hours.

Does Honda love his job?

"Very much so," he says. "So many jobs are the same thing every day. This one is not. Every game in a homestand, something happens and you say: What was that? Everyone is looking at each other, waiting for an obscure ruling."

The Sox are out of town July 16, but Honda doesn't plan to sit still.

Houston, are you ready for him?

"It's the best way to celebrate your birthday," Honda says. "Earn a buck!"

Q&A MICHAEL PHELPS

Swimmer's love of golf is evident

By Teddy Greenstein
Chicago Tribune

One has 23 Olympic gold medals in swimming. The other, 15 major championships.

Michael Phelps can relate to Tiger Woods, especially after watching him up close at the Masters. Perhaps you saw the picture of Phelps behind the 16th tee at Augusta National.

"Tiger has laser-beam eyes when he walks onto the course; it's intense," Phelps said Monday during a 15-minute interview with the Tribune. "I know that feeling. I enjoy staying back and just watching him out there. He is so in tune with everything, so in control. I feel like every step is calculated so perfectly."

The sporting giants can also relate in their struggles with addiction and substance abuse. Now 33 and the father of two young kids with a third on the way, Phelps is devoting his time to two main causes: child water safety and mental health.

Phelps has been open about his battles with depression and impulse control, saying Monday: "There are a lot of people out there who struggle with the same thing. It's challenging to be vulnerable. People need to understand: It's OK to not be OK. It doesn't matter who you are, what you do, where you come from. It's life; we're going to go through struggles.

"The more we work together, the more we can help everyone who is struggling. Suicide numbers are way too high, and that is something that needs to change. If I can save one life, five lives, a thousand lives, a million lives, that's way better than ever winning a gold medal."

Phelps lives in Scottsdale, Ariz., and ventured to St. Charles on Sunday and Monday to host his third celebrity charity event, called Golf.Give.Gala. Celebs such as Tim Tebow, Kerry Wood, David Ross, Eric Ferguson and Dennis Haysbert took part to raise money (a goal of $1 million) for Phelps' foundation.

Phelps has no connection to Chicago's western suburbs, but St. Charles is the headquarters of presenting sponsor ALE Solutions, which provides temporary housing to families displaced by natural disasters.

"We love coming here," Phelps said. "The community is amazing and the (Arcada) Theatre where we have the gala is intimate with a really good vibe."

Phelps took a break from hosting for this chat:

With the PGA Championship moving to May, you couldn't have any tour pros at the gala?

It's challenging schedule-wise because May is a big month — it's water safety month and mental health awareness month. We couldn't get a pro golfer, but you could feel the electricity at the gala and auctions. ... We actually had to cut out shortly after one of the VIP parties with my wife (Nicole) being pregnant.

So your sons, Boomer and Beckett, are 3 and 2 and you have another on the way? Boy or girl?

We don't know and we decided we'd wait as long as we could. It's hard because neither one of us likes surprises. So we'll see how long we can go before we find the sex out. And then it will be pure chaos ... but amazing chaos.

If you could determine that your kids would be either world-class swimmers or golfers ...

Golf. If my kids want to swim, great, but I don't want to push them down that road. I want them to find their own identity. The other side of that is, I'll be a greedy dad from time to time, and to sweat on the Sunday of a major would be pretty awesome.

Were you able to watch the PGA Championship on Sunday?

Yeah, when (Dustin Johnson) started making the turn. (Brooks) Koepka put himself in a little pickle and got out of it. The guy is putting on a clinic. What's impressive is not only how he hits it, but how he hits it from all the spots. ... He has figured out what works very well for him — and that's what sports are, right? You find out what your strengths are and use them to your advantage.

We talked about your goals in relation to mental health awareness. What else drives you?

To help wherever I can. Give back to kids at the Boys & Girls Clubs and Special Olympics. To teach a healthy and active lifestyle — that's so important to me. And water safety. It's very important and very scary how a child can lose their life in the blink of eye. It's the second-highest cause of accidental death for children under 14. That needs to change; (water safety) is the only reason why I was ever put in the sport of swimming.

LaVall Jordan helped fuel Michigan's rise under John Beilein

TED S. WARREN/AP 2000

LaVall Jordan's acumen with developing players' skills has been attributed to playing experience at different levels, including at Butler, above, from 1997-2001 and professionally overseas.

CHRIS CARLSON/AP

New Cavaliers coach John Beilein was widely known for his ability to evaluate and develop players at Michigan, even turning unheralded recruits into NBA draft picks.

By James Hawkins | The Detroit News

When LaVall Jordan arrived at Michigan in 2010, the basketball program was in a state of flux. The Wolverines were coming off a 15-17 season and the entire assistant coaching staff was overhauled and replaced by the 2010-11 campaign.

But before Jordan left after six seasons for head-coaching stops at Milwaukee and Butler, he helped transform the Wolverines from a bubble team to a national-title contender.

While former coach John Beilein spearheaded the program's revival, Jordan, an Albion, Mich., native,was as instrumental as anyone in Michigan's rise during his time in Ann Arbor.

"He should get a ton of credit," Josh Bartelstein, who played for Michigan from 2009-13, told The Detroit News. "I think the first thing LaVall and all the assistant coaches do is define who we are in our mission statement, in our core values and LaVall has his fingerprints all over that.

"When you look back on Coach Beilein's tenure at Michigan and the 12 years, there's clearly an inflection point of when those assistant coaches (Jeff Meyer and Bacari Alexander) and 'Vallcame in. He did an incredible job and people took notice."

As Michigan's coaching search hits the one-week mark, Jordan's name has garnered attention as a potential successor to Beilein.

While it's still anybody's guess which direction athletic director Warde Manuel will go with the hire, Jordan checks off several boxes based on the criteria that Manuel is looking for.

Player developer

Beilein was widely known for his ability to evaluate and develop players, even turning unheralded recruits into NBA Draft picks.

Yet, Jordan established his own respectable track record at Michigan and aided in the development of several of the program's top backcourt players.

"If you look through the guards that went through our program whether it was Tim (Hardaway Jr.) or Caris (LeVert) or Nik (Stauskas) or Trey (Burke) or Darius (Morris), how many of those guys went to the NBA? And none of them were five-star recruits," Bartelstein said. "Those players get a ton of credit, Coach Beilein gets a lot of credit and 'Vall was an integral part of that, as well. He's a really incredible player development coach and elite level as far as working with guards."

Bartelstein said Jordan's success in that area stemmed from the amount of time he would spend watching film, breaking down clips and using examples from other college or NBA players.

"He's a student of the game, and I think he's a basketball savant when it comes down to playing within the pick-and-roll and playing between dribbles and understanding how to change speeds and change direction," Bartelstein said. "I've been lucky to be around basketball for most of life now and he's one of the best."

Stuart Douglass, who played at Michigan from 2008-12, credited Jordan with adding the floater to his game — a shot he still carries with him as he plays overseas in Israel — and teaching him how to play with pace.

According to Douglass, Jordan excelled at developing players' skills because he had playing experience at different levels — at Butler from 1997-2001 and professionally overseas — and he never stopped trying to learn once he moved into coaching in 2003.

"He was never the most athletic guy when he played, but he was still a great scorer and a good shooter, and he knew how to get his shot off," Douglass said. "We played similarly (from an athletic standpoint), so just picking up from that details here and there about spacing, about keeping guys on your hip on ball screens and getting shots off over taller guys.

"He's just been growing his knowledge of the game every year as far as I can tell. He employed a lot of what he taught us just from personal experience. A lot of stuff in our offense (at Michigan) was very dictated by the system and with a lot of ball-screen stuff with the point guard, so he probably couldn't teach us everything that he had in his basketball brain."

Coaching experience

Douglass described Jordan's coaching style as "very calm but serious," and noted he was always professional and attentive to detail during their two seasons together at Michigan.

"Everyone respected him, and he knew a lot about that game on both sides of the ball," Douglass said. "Our offense was pretty much a set .but defensively I was really impressed with how all the assistants were very knowledgeable on defense game to game and game planning. It was like all parts. There was really nothing missing that I saw."

Jordan spent 13 years as an assistant coach at Butler, Iowa and Michigan before he landed his first head coaching job at Milwaukee in 2016.

During his one year at Milwaukee, the Panthers finished with an 11-24 record before making an improbable run to the Horizon League tournament title game as the No. 10 seed.

The next year, Jordan was hired by his alma mater to replace Chris Holtmann and became Butler's fourth head coach in six seasons. In his first year, Jordan led the Bulldogs to a 21-14 mark, a win over No. 1-ranked Villanova in the regular season and to the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

Last season, though, Butler fell to 16-17 and landed in the NIT after losing five of its final seven regular-season games to drop out of NCAA Tournament contention.

Jordan has a 48-55 record over the past three seasons and in two of those years his teams have finished last in the conference. His past two recruiting classes at Butler also ranked No. 62 and No. 103 in the nation and No. 9 in the 10-team Big East, according to 247Sports.

Despite the up-and-down start to his head-coaching career, Bartelstein described Jordan as someone who is down-to-earth, who can connect with everyone and who "looks at things from 100,000 feet and makes strategic decisions."

"I think he has a great feel for X's and O's and schemes," Bartelstein said. "And how that relates to him as a coach is he'll take a step back, he's very calm and he'll get on you when he needs to get on you, but he's much more of a calming presence. He's a guy who you know has your back and you want to play hard for him.

"He's incredibly well respected and I think all the success he's had is well deserved."

Winning, integrity

In addition to building Michigan back up, Beilein had a sparkling reputation for doing things the right way and running one of the cleanest programs in the nation.

Manuel said given the issues that have popped up in the sport last offseason, he wants a leader who is "beyond reproach."

According to Bartelstein, Jordan is "cut from the same fabric" as Beilein and Michigan's core values are "embedded in his blood."

"Before you can coach your players, you've got to know them as people and care about them as people because the players are going to play harder for you," Bartelstein said. "When the first questions you ask are about your family, about their life and their school, it makes a big difference than just about the amount of points they score or the assists they have. What I think what LaVall is great at is he cultivates relationships off the court and it's not just about performing. It's someone like me who truly didn't score a lot of points; I still talked to Coach Jordan. Whether you're the star player or the 15th player, he does an incredible job connecting with you and players respect you for that and they want to play.

"I think if you watch Butler, Milwaukee and players at Michigan, all of his guys want to play hard for him because they want to show what LaVall stands for. And the way to do that is to perform on the court at the highest level."

Douglass added Jordan played a crucial role in establishing and carrying on the culture Beilein was striving for but wasn't able to achieve during his first few years at Michigan.

"From Day 1, I noticed he aligned very much with Coach Beilein," Douglass said of Jordan's values and what he stands for.

"They are not even close to the exact same person, but in that sense they're probably about as similar as any other coach I've had. If Michigan wants to keep that going, that seems like a perfect succession plan."

Making a case

While Jordan is viewed as a possible candidate, the question is whether his resume is deserving enough and, more importantly, if he's ready for the next step.

That's ultimately for Manuel to decide. But if Manuel does strongly consider Jordan, Douglass said his former assistant coach would be prepared for the job.

"I think as much as you want to win every game, you need to lose and you need to feel some of that pain to prepare yourself for growth at the heading coaching position," Douglass said. "Even with Beilein's escalation from where he started to where he is now, he experienced a lot of ups and downs and a lot of those growing pains, and I think it's necessary.

"He understands the expectations at Michigan. He understands all of it top to bottom, like recruiting the state, recruiting in the Midwest, which he's still been doing for the last three years, the administration, the fans, all of it. I think going into it makes it a smooth transition for the future. Five years from now I don't know how that will translate,but I think at the beginning it would be a pretty smooth transition."

ASHBURN, Va. — Sunglasses shield your eyes from the infrared lights that give oxygen to your body's cells. Ugg boots, rubber gloves and shorts are the only protection from freezing temperatures as cold as minus 200 degrees. Then comes the sensory deprivation of floating pitch black in 1,000 pounds of Epsom salt while meditation music plays.

And that's just at work. At home is a custom-made mattress designed to get just the right amount of sleep.

Massage tables, zero gravity chairs, a laser-therapy table that looks like a tanning bed, a cryotherapy chamber and giant float pods make up the Washington Redskins' state-of-the-art rest and recovery room.

Combined with advanced mattress and pillow technology, it's all part of Washington's pursuit of better injury prevention and recovery after no NFL team put more players on season-ending injured reserve over the past two years combined.

"It's more like restoration," head athletic trainer Larry Hess told The Associated Press during a recent visit to the recovery room. "There's things in here that are setting their body up to perform better in the weight room, to perform better in their meetings mentally. Mental preparedness. That's where our advantage is."

Professional and college sports teams are always looking for the next edge, and the Redskins hope they're on the right track by zeroing in on rest and relaxation as a way to keep players healthier and more focused. The idea came from Hess and owner Dan Snyder visiting English Premier League soccer clubs and discovering after nutrition and player tracking, they considered sleep the next great frontier.

Hess and player recovery director Hutch Call struck up a partnership early last season with Bedgear, which works closely with cutting edge owner Mark Cuban's Dallas Mavericks and provides Redskins players, coaches and staff with mattresses, pillows, sheets and blankets optimized for their needs. Call said focus gleaned from the right amount of sleep could be the difference between a receiver catching a ball and bringing it down and getting it knocked out of his hands, plus there are more practical elements.

"Our bodies go through a restoration process while we sleep, doing important things like balancing hormones related to tissue growth, stress control, appetite and weight management," MIT research scientist and Bedgear sleep scientist and biometrics expert Lorenzo Turicchia said. "When a person does not get the right amount of sleep, their bodies will not be able to adequately repair damaged tissues, thus prolonging the healing time."

Redskins players have required plenty of healing. The team led the league with 27 players on injured reserve last season and put 19 players on in 2017 .

Late in the 2017 season, since-released safety D.J. Swearinger criticized some teammates for not taking care of their bodies well enough to limit preventable injuries, which contributed to missing the playoffs.

"You're not supposed to wait till something happens to you to get treatment," Swearinger said at the time. "You're supposed to do stuff to prevent injuries, and I don't think as a group we did that as much as other teams I've been on. Some injuries are freak injuries."

Another injury happened Monday when linebacker Reuben Foster stepped on an offensive lineman's foot and went down wrong on his left leg. Foster had to be carted off in another hard-luck injury for Washington that's hard to prevent.

"When you have broken bones, (torn) ACLs, things like that, you're going to have those type of injuries," Hess said.

Hess said the team reduced soft-tissue injuries — such as sprains, strains, tendinitis and damage to muscles, tendons and ligaments — by more than 50 percent last season. He hopes that progress will continue now that players have a full offseason to take advantage of the recovery room at the practice facility.

After a typical Sunday game, massage therapists and a chiropractor are available for players on Monday and then again Friday. The recovery room is always open and sometimes is the location of meetings to help a player relax and not hunch over a desk while watching film.

The three-step restoration process starts with a minimum of 12 minutes inside a photobiomodulation bed that resembles a tanning booth and uses three types of infrared light to help repair cells all over the body. Hess said it's good for recovery and studies have shown it improves strength on lifts in the weight room.

The next step is three finger-tingling minutes inside the cryotherapy chamber, where it feels difficult to breathe because the extreme cold tricks the body into rushing blood to major organs to survive. It's different than getting in a cold tub full of ice or putting an ice bag on because the seconds and minutes after cryotheraphy come with an endorphin release capable of waking up a groggy player.

"Your core body temperature shoots up because of the fight-or-flight," Call said. "You just had everything (go) to your major organs. Now it's just shooting back out in your bloodstream."

The coup de grace is up to an hour latched inside one of three Superior float tanks designed to take away all the senses and that can actually make players fall asleep. Hess said it's supposed to replicate the weightless feeling of a baby in a womb, and it feels similar to floating in the Dead Sea.

"It's an amazing experience," Hess said. "Our goal is to get them to that pre-sleep state to shut their body down. It will lower their heart rate. The temperature of the water replicates your body temperature. Really we're taking all sensation out."

A player showers and puts on lotion to keep the salt from damaging skin, and then a lot of times it's off to bed to rest up for the next grueling day. Quarterback Colt McCoy has been big on giving feedback on bedding technology because he and his wife sleep at different temperatures.

"The mattress and pillows are comfortable and cool," McCoy said Monday. "I don't sweat at night thanks to their technology. I get a full night's rest and feel recharged every morning."

Bedgear is also working to develop ankle pillows to help athletes elevate their feet after the stress of a game or practice.

"It's a problem that a lot of the players have when they're on their feet for hours during a game and they're getting sort of this compression and swelling in their lower limbs," Bedgear vice president of strategy Shana Rocheleau said. "They just kind of hodgepodge things together today to put their feet up and try to get the blood flowing."

Coach Jay Gruden said players choose how much of the recovery techniques they want to get involved with, and that varies throughout the roster. He has tried out the recovery room devices himself, thinks they're pretty cool and most importantly believes they'll make a difference on the injury front.

"Give these guys just another way to help them recover," Gruden said. "The players, even if it gives them a mental state of mind where, 'Hey, I feel pretty good,' then let's give them every avenue to feel that way."

Beanie Feldstein and Kaitlyn Dever 'don't need a makeover to be accepted' in 'Booksmart'

By Michael Phillips | Chicago Tribune

Opening Friday, director Olivia Wilde's "Booksmart" arrives just in time to make the movie year a little less Guyville.

The film stars Kaitlyn Dever and Beanie Feldstein as Amy and Molly, best friends since childhood and straight-A hyperachievers in high school. On the last day of senior year, Amy and Molly realize they forgot to have fun along the way. The comedy, equal parts raunch and sweetness but without a speck of meanness, chronicles that final day, evening and the following morning as Molly (straight) and Amy (gay) pursue their crushes across town at a series of senior parties, a few painful reckonings, a temporary rift in their friendship and a realization that they are who they are, and they're ready for whatever's next.

I talked with Dever, 22, and Feldstein, 25, recently over ... nothing. The waiter came by at NoMi Kitchen, in the downtown Park Hyatt, and they politely ordered nothing. Since shooting "Booksmart" last year, Dever embarked on the forthcoming Netflix limited series, Unbelievable," starring Toni Collette, scheduled for this fall.

Feldstein has since shot episodes of the "What We Do in the Shadows" TV spinoff as well as the feature "How to Build a Girl," adapted from Caitlin Moran's book. She's also attached to the film version of the Chicago-sprung play "The Humans," to co-star Amy Schumer, Steven Yeun and Richard Jenkins.

The following is an edited transcript of the conversation.

Q: So after suffering through so many rom-coms, hinging on an unpleasant Type-A cliché who needs to be "broken," somehow, by the plot and the male lead, usually in a male-written script ... how does it feel to have rescued the high-achieving female lead from the realm of stereotype?

Dever: Honestly, it feels great! That's one thing, among many, that I really liked about "Booksmart." It's about two women whose goal is not to chase a man. It's to prove to themselves they can be fun, and prove it to others. They don't need a makeover to be accepted.

Feldstein: Our movie kind of busts the idea of certain archetypes wide open. It starts with these two insanely smart, brilliant women, but they're cool! And they're weird. And they're dumb too sometimes! They're multidimensional.

Only Olivia could pull that off and keep us all in the same movie because she's as bright as she is cool. And warm. Her observation of micro moments was kind of stunning. I remem-

Fascinating portrayals, highly immersive plot makes you want more

Walter Briggs and Keith Gallagher take part in an intense scene in "Mary Shelley's Frankenstein" at Lookingglass Theatre.

So what, exactly, were Mary Godwin, Percy Shelley, Claire Clairmont and George Gordon Byron all really doing in the Villa Diodati in Lake Geneva (Switzerland, not Wisconsin) in the rainy summer of 1816?

They were a strikingly intimate group. Shelley and Godwin already had a child. Clairmont was pregnant with Byron's offspring. All four of them were intellectual, good-looking sensualists without any need to do any actual, you know, work. Nobody was waiting tables at Le Bistro de Cologny and then toppling into bed exhausted.

Mary Godwin — who, at the age of 18, was already calling herself Mrs. Shelley — has told us some stuff: the group boated a bit and walked around in the rain a bit, but also found itself confined by the weather to the house. They "talked" for hours around the fire. At Lord Byron's admonition, everyone was obliged to come up with a scary ghost story. Depending on your point of view, that might have been a form of casual patriarchal tyranny or an inspired prompt.

Either way, it ended up producing perhaps the most famous horror story ever written, "Frankenstein," also the year's most produced story in Chicago

Betsy Brandt stars on the CBS comedy "Life in Pieces," in its fourth and final season.

The CBS comedy "Life in Pieces," now in its final season, stars Betsy Brandt, Thomas Sadoski and Colin Hanks as adult siblings. Cast members on shows often say they're like family, but what about when they're actually playing members of a family?

"I always pick on Colin and I think it's because he plays the baby," Brandt said, "and I don't know that I'm in a position to do that, but it doesn't stop me. He's pretty gracious about it.

"And Tommy, we'll text funny jokes to each other. He's become a really good friend of mine, so those scenes when we're together are incredibly fun to shoot. I love both of those guys."

Brandt, who became a household name playing Hank's wife Marie on "Breaking Bad," is returning to the world of drama with the Chicago-set "Suits" spinoff "Pearson," starring Gina Torres and premiering July 17 on USA.

Whitney Houston's estate has struck a deal that could lead to a new album and a touring hologram.

Whitney Houston revival underway

Pop titan Whitney Houston's estate is planning a resurgence for the late singer that includes a new album of unreleased tracks, a touring hologram, a potential Broadway musical and other branding deals.

The Grammy-winning megastar died in 2012 from a combination of heart trouble and cocaine ingestion at age 48.

Houston's estate has struck a deal with Primary Wave Music, a boutique marketing firm that specializes in reviving the classic catalogs — of Smokey Robinson, Bob Marley and Def Leppard, among others — through branding and entertainment deals.

The company will acquire half of the Houston estate's assets, including royalties from her music and films, merchandising and rights to use her name and likeness. That includes profit share in her hit films "The Bodyguard" (and the musical), "Waiting to Exhale," "The Preacher's Wife," "Cinderella" and "Sparkle," according to a Monday statement from Primary Wave Music.

The performer's sister-in-law and former manager, Pat Houston, the executor of the singer's estate, is behind the strategic rollout.

Music for the new album is expected to be drawn from unused tracks from the singer's self-titled 1985 debut album. It is unclear when the purported projects will premiere.

Depp debt alleged: Johnny Depp was hit with a $350,000 lawsuit on Monday from a law firm that claims he has not paid his bills. Depp retained Buckley LLP in the fall of 2017 to sue his former entertainment law firm, Bloom Hergott LLP. Three Buckley attorneys worked on the case until January. Depp is now represented by Adam Waldman and attorneys from Brown Rudnick LLP. According to the suit, Buckley has billed the actor $535,697.28, and Depp has paid only $187,717.39, leaving a balance of $347,979.89.

Fanning faints: Actress Elle Fanning collapsed at a Cannes Film Festival dinner Monday evening. The 21-year-old later posted a message with a thumbs-up photo on Instagram saying she was "all good" despite what she called a fainting spell from her snug Prada gown. Fanning is on the jury in Cannes.

Oliver's chain insolvent: Celebrity chef Jamie Oliver's British restaurant chain has become insolvent. The firm said Tuesday that it had gone into administration, a form of bankruptcy protection. The company operates 23 Jamie's Italian restaurants in the U.K. Oliver said he was "deeply saddened by this outcome and would like to thank all of the staff and our suppliers who have put their hearts and souls into this business for over a decade."

Vulnerability elicits a rude response

Dear Amy: My daughter and her friend, freshmen in college, visited her grandparents in Florida over spring break. While there, my daughter was sharing vulnerably with her grandmother about how her birth control was messing up her menstrual cycle and not helping her skin as intended. She told her grandmother she was going to stop taking it.

In response, my mother-in-law grabbed my daughter's wrist and held onto it tightly, so she could not move away from the admonishment she had in store. My MIL leaned in and said strongly, "Be careful not to get raped and pregnant." Then she laughed. My daughter didn't know what to do with that, other than justify herself and her choices: where she went to school, who she hangs around with, what she does and why. All of which are so mild. She spent the remaining two days dodging her grandmother.

I haven't addressed these issues with my MIL. I've been very angry. My daughter is so hurt. I'm leaving a response up to my husband. We've had these issues before where my MIL says hurtful things. When we tell her, she goes into victim mode. She blames others and barely takes responsibility.

Thoughts on how to tackle this?

— Disgusted

Dear Disgusted: Your daughter made a rookie mistake in talking to her thoughtless and hurtful grandmother about something as personal as her birth control method.

I'm not saying these topics should be out of bounds between all grandchildren and grandparents, but this particular grandmother sounds like a loose cannon. Lesson learned. (And if someone grabbed me like that, it would be the last time I came within an arm's length of them.)

I'm going to assume that your daughter might be too intimidated to advocate for herself. So yes, I suggest a conversation with your mother-in-law, starting with "What on earth were you thinking?" Tell her that your daughter found her remark bewildering, inappropriate and hurtful, and that you agree with your daughter's response.

And then let it lie. Don't insist on any further action. Let her stew in her juice. If she tries to fix this, she'll probably make things worse, but that's on her.

You might encourage your daughter to see her gram as the equivalent of a blowhard frat bro. Standing up for herself when gram offends her might be good training for dealing with others who try to rudely invade her space.

Also, you should work with your daughter to find a form of birth control that helps to control her symptoms, in addition to preventing pregnancy.

Dear Amy: My brother-in-law married a woman in her late 60s who has collected things for years. My husband and I used to go visit them once a month for a few days.

She has no grandchildren, and we have four. One time I asked her for something for my oldest grandchild. She gave me a beautiful music box, and then I asked her for a doll. She gave me one, but I put her on the spot and asked for another.

Now I see that after going to their house for years and never taking them out to eat or bringing them anything, we were wrong. Now when we mention a visit, they have other plans. I know it's because I was asking her to give me things, but she has so much! Now she is so cool to us, and we know we're not welcome. How can we fix this?

— Regretful

Dear Regretful: You and your husband visited this couple each month "for a few days." You were given things you asked for, and then you asked for more.

The way to fix this is to acknowledge their generosity and your own greed, and then apologize for it. Say, "I feel terrible, and hope you will find it in your heart to forgive me."

The rest is up to her.

Dear Amy: "Lonely Kiddos" was an entitled mom who was whining about her children not having playmates during holidays, when their neighbors were busy with their families.

Thank you for telling her to "buck up!" Her neighbors' function is not to supply this woman's kids with 24-hour playmates.

— Upset

Dear Upset: I was also struck by this woman's lament — and her lack of perspective.

'I Am Easy to Find' shakes up the National's formula

By Greg Kot
Chicago Tribune

'I Am Easy to Find'

The National
★★ (out of four)

There is one radiant voice that keeps the National's more-subdued-than-usual new album buoyant, and it doesn't belong to any of the band members. It's the voice of Gail Ann Dorsey, longtime bassist and backing singer for David Bowie.

For its eighth album, "I Am Easy to Find" (4AD), the National shook things up by bringing in a clutch of female vocalists to share the microphone with singer Matt Berninger. It sounds more like a detour in the band's discography than a continuation of past work, a remix rather than a renewal. Thanks to Dorsey — as well as singers such as Sharon Van Etten, Lisa Hannigan and Kate Stables of the U.K. band This is the Kit —it has flash points, but it never quite builds any momentum, and drags precipitously at its midpoint.

A 24-minute film by director Mike Mills, based on some of the National's music, in turn inspired some of the songwriting by Berninger and company. Mills was brought on board to co-produce, and the band veered from formula — the mourning-song arrangements, the stately, simmer-to-a-boil rock — to create something more open-ended, subtle and painterly. The songs dive back into familiar subject matter: couples struggling with doubt about the world, each other, themselves. But now they present both perspectives in the relationship as Berninger trades lines with his female foils.

"I just can't find a way to forgive myself," sings Berninger on the opening "You Had Your Soul With You," which sounds like three dozen National songs we've already heard. Then Dorsey enters after about two minutes and the song's foundation shifts ––no histrionics, just straight and sure, a beacon to clear the gloom. On "Hey Rosey," there is consolation, empathy — not just in the words, but in the very tone of Dorsey's voice as she sings the first verse and then shadows Berninger's vocal thereafter.

Despite the inventive drumming of Bryan Devendorf and the string arrangements of guitarist Bryce Dessner (particularly on "The Pull of You" and "Quiet Light"), the arrangements only rarely bring out the drama in these interactions. The intimacy becomes wearying, with spoken-word interludes, interstitial pieces and hushed vocals stretching the 16 songs to 64 minutes, an experiment in search of a direction. The most radical album of the National's career is also its most disappointing.

ber her talking about about watching kids flirt when she was in high school, when something as simple as a hand on a shoulder, if you're watching someone else do it, you're thinking: How does someone actually do that?

Q: Do you remember any films from early on in your life, where you thought: This is speaking to me, but I wish I heard more from the female characters?

Feldstein: It's not a movie — is that OK? — but I grew up on "Boy Meets World." (The situation comedy ran from 1993 to 2000.) And I could relate to the Ben Savage character, but I loved Topanga Lawrence (Danielle Fishel), Cory's girlfriend. You never saw her much at home or (would) see her get her own storylines.

Dever: This is a different issue, I guess, but what comes to mind for me is "The Princess Diaries." I always wished that she went back to her own hair and eyebrows. I wanted her to be princess with curly hair and her Doc Martens. That movie really shaped me growing up.

Feldstein: It does get a lot right, though, for sure.

Dever: I love that movie SO MUCH.

Q: Beanie, you've actually worked with more female directors than male in your career?

Feldstein: Yes.

Q: I don't know if I've ever interviewed anybody where that was the case.

Feldstein: That's not lost on me how rare that is.

Q: Kaitlyn, your first job (a 2009 "American Girl" direct-to-video movie) was directed by Martha Coolidge, is that right?

Dever: I actually forgot about that! Wow. I was 11. It was in LA, I hadn't moved there yet; I was back and forth between Texas, where I grew up.

Q: Is there any generalization worth making, do you think, about working with a woman behind the camera?

that were the case.

There was one director I worked with. I've never talked about this before, though maybe I told you, Beanie. The lead actor and the director were having it out, really getting into the scene, talking through all kinds of specifics. I had a smaller role, and I was just sort of patiently waiting for my turn to talk. And I asked a simple question: "Anything specific you need from me in this scene?" And the director said: "Just, you know, be a girl." I would never hear that from a woman.

Feldstein: You did tell me that.

Dever: That was sort of shocking to me. I should've said something at the time, but that's hard.

Feldstein: I've had the privilege of working with a lot of actor-turned directors, male and female. Jerry Zaks, who directed "Hello, Dolly!" on Broadway (Feldstein played Minnie Faye), used to be an actor. Greta (Gerwig, writer-director of "Lady Bird"), of course. I love that it's happening more and more. And now Olivia with "Booksmart."

Actors get to be on so many different people's sets, but directors, they're only on their own sets. I remember Greta saying this. You only know how you do things. But actors know how all these different people do things, and if they direct they can take what they appreciate and bring it back to their own sets.

Q: When did you two meet?

Feldstein: We finally actually met when we were both attached to the project, though Kaitlyn had been attached for a long time. The script's been around in various forms since 2009. Four years ago Kaitlyn got the script, then Olivia and then me. I'd read the older incarnation, for a role that doesn't exist anymore.

Q: What's in the movie from those earlier drafts, and what's new?

Feldstein: It's always been a film centered on Molly and Amy, these best friends. But a lot of the rest of it has changed. (The credited screenwriters are Emily Halpern, Sarah Haskin, Susanna Fogel and the last one in, Katie Silberman.) Things change a lot in 10 years. Technology changes; the political state of the world changes.

The spirit of this generation now is so progressive. People want to be inclusive and welcome each other in. Katie Silverman really brought that spirit into the film. And Olivia really brought the stakes. In high school, the stakes feel so high, and she said she wanted to capture that un-ironically. Olivia pitched "Booksmart" to me as "Training Day" for high school.

Q: What does it feel like to pursue careers right now, in this moment, in the wake of Harvey Weinstein, #MeToo, #TimesUp, Trump — everything?

Dever: The industry really has changed in a hurry. I do believe that. Everything you mentioned has helped allow people to speak up when they should and not feel afraid. It's allowed people to actually do the doing instead of just talking ... and I hope this movie can add to the conversation in a way.

It reminds me why I started acting in the first place: to give voice to stories that might not have been heard a few years ago. At screenings, parents are thanking us for giving this film to their kids. I wish I had been able to grow up with a film like this.

theater, thanks to a blend of anniversaries and coincidence, and the summer offering at the Lookingglass Theatre, where David Catlin has billed his evening "Mary Shelley's Frankenstein."

This title is not some bit of expedient brand emphasis, like "Rodgers and Hammerstein's Oklahoma," now on Broadway, but an accurate descriptor: Catlin's premise is that you can't understand "Frankenstein" without looking hard at what Mary was doing, and feeling, with her very attractive friends.

She had been having bad dreams during that "ungenial" summer: "I saw the hideous phantasm of a man stretched out, and then, on the working of some powerful engine, show signs of life, and stir with an uneasy, half vital motion," she later wrote.

Hmmm.

The impact of Catlin's decision to tell both the famous yarn about the young scientist who accidentally creates a monstrous creature and the origin story at its core is that the resulting entertainment is highly immersive. And, if you think about it, who wants to go and see a "Frankenstein" that does not tug at body and soul?

Catlin's swirling staging (especially in concert with the scenic designer Dan Ostling) not only pays homage to the long circus tradition at Lookingglass, but it also references this important theater company's most central contribution to the aesthetic of the Chicago theater — its sophisticated fascination with the narrative mechanisms of storytellings, and the relationship of the teller to the material being told.

Thus, in "Mary Shelley's Frankenstein," the creepy monster, a shape-shifter capable of reflecting the desires of the viewer, seems to be birthed out of a sensual Swiss boudoir, filled with anarchic young experimenters, fascinated by the intersections of intellect and their own blooming sexual potency and desire.

History teaches us, of course, that such a cocktail can bring danger to anyone who imbibes without caution, and that facet is very much part of Catlin's work here. Frankenstein's monster has always been viewed in literature, theater and film as a malleable other, reflective of our collective fears of a given moment: he can represent our terror of robotics or invading aliens of any kind. Over time, he has become an all-purpose noun representing the terrifyingly hideous. Here, you see his other side, as dreamed up by a young genius who surely was just on the cusp of understanding the dangers and possibilities that lay ahead.

Mary Shelley is the work of the actress Cordelia Dewdney, and this really is a prismatic kind of performance, dripping with the complicated. Walter Briggs is on hand as Shelley and Keith D. Gallagher is a rather terrifying Lord Byron, who kept putting me in mind of Freddie Mercury, which is probably a pretty accurate comparative. The least known of this quartet, Claire Clairmont, is played by Cruz Gonzalez-Cadel. This, too, is a fascinating piece of acting, the kind that makes you want more.

Mary dreams up Dr. John Polidori, (Debo Balogun), who seems to rise up and fall down at the whims of his creator, negotiating the weight of his own alter ego. I think Catlin probably wanted to probe the onset of sadness more than he fully manages, all these other achievements aside. But this is a throbbing rather than a frivolous "Frankenstein," that's for sure. And you never doubt whence he came.

played by Morgan Spector, and I play his wife," Brandt said. "One of the reasons I was so happy to go to 'Pearson' was, as much as I like doing comedy (on "Life in Pieces"), I get to flex my muscles and sink my teeth into drama. And sometimes I'll do both shows in the same day, which is a long day but amazing."

A Michigan native, Brandt received her BFA in acting from the University of Illinois and says the Midwest is in her blood: "When people comment on how hard I work ,I'm like, yeah, that's what we do."

When asked about a worst moment in her career, Brandt replied: "I've thought about this and I've read your column and I'm sure this will not shock you: I've had plenty of embarrassing moments and difficult moments where I was like, 'And this happened and then I cried and I didn't know if was going to be an actor.'

"But the story I'm going to go with is when I worked with Sting on 'The Michael J. Fox Show.' What makes it stand out for me is that it happened later in my career."

My worst moment ...

"I grew up watching 'Family Ties' and watching Michael J. Fox be brilliant as Alex P. Keaton. And then I was lucky enough to play his wife on his sitcom that we did four or five years ago.

"It's funny, an actor friend of mine who lives and works in New York now but he's also from Michigan, he said to me, 'How's it working with Michael J. Fox?' And I said, 'Oh my God, he's amazing — he's one of us! He's Canadian! Our neighbor to the north! We're the same!'

"Like, we would all hang out and talk about hockey. These are my people. He and I clicked right away. So doing the show with Mike, that was big enough.

"But I have been a huge Sting fan since before I was even in middle school, I think. I used to listen to (his first solo album) 'The Dream of the Blue Turtles' when we'd get ready in the morning. I've always seen him in concert. And then I find out he's going to be on an episode of our show playing himself.

"I've been lucky enough to meet and work with a lot of actors that I've looked up to and admired — when you're on a show like 'Breaking Bad,' there's some privilege that comes with that — but you're both just actors going to work. So I'm used to that and I really wasn't prepared to embarrass myself in the way that I did when Sting showed up to set.

"Now, I want to say — I feel like I'm blushing just telling you about this — he showed up in leather pants, a casual sweater and with his guitar. And he would just strum his guitar while we're were getting ready for our scene. He's beyond cool.

"The episode was, Michael J. Fox was a big fan of Sting's, so I have him come and play as a gift for my husband for Christmas. My character doesn't know who Sting is, by the way, so I'm trying to play that while inside I'm freaking out because it's Sting. So we do our first take, and it's just he and I in the scene.

"And that's when everything fell apart. I'm not really sure what I did or didn't do. I have no recollection — don't even ask me what I did.

"I barely made it through the scene with this glazed look. I didn't remember any of the blocking; I just wandered around, probably like someone who had just suffered a severe concussion. This had never happened to me before.

"I clearly remember the reaction of my co-workers and they were shocked. There was a lot of laughter too. But I was like, 'I'm so sorry — I don't know what I'm doing out there! I'm trying, short of drooling on myself. I'm just a mess.'

"And I said to the director, 'It's not that your direction is not important and I don't agree and I want to do my own thing, but this is the best I can do right now.'

"The thing is, I'm always prepared — so this was awful.

"So I said, 'Just give me a few more takes. Let me get this out of my system.' And one of our camera guys said, 'What are you freaking out for?' And I said, 'He's Sting. And he's also just devastatingly handsome.' And he said, 'He could be your dad.' And I said, 'No, my dad is not nearly that hot!'

"I mean, I still remember that day, him sitting there, humming 'Englishman in New York' — because there was a reference to that song in the script — and I have to tell you, he was so lovely. We sat down while they were moving the cameras and he just told me about his life. And I was so at ease after that. He would talk about his wife in a way that only made him hotter. I just thought he was perfect.

"My husband showed up at lunch — which he never did — but he showed up with our 4-year-old boy and I jokingly said, 'My husband showed up to pee a circle around me,' because I was working with Sting and my husband's not an idiot. But our son was obsessed with Sting — he's very charismatic and my son was so drawn to him.

"At the end of the day, there was a scene where Sting plays a song and it's like a mini-concert and it was just too much — I started crying. And Mike looked at me and I was like, 'It's just too much!'

"I'd held my (stuff) together all day and I was so tired by that point and I was done."

ERIC LIEBOWITZ/NBC

Sting, left, guest starred on the "Christmas" episode "The Michael J. Fox Show" with Besty Brandt, middle, and Michael J. Fox.

Has Brandt ever felt so off her game at work before?

"I don't think so. Because when you're with another actor, you're both in the same club. But for me clearly if it's a rock star, all bets are off, which is so weird because I was never the girl in college who was like, 'I want the guy in the band!' My husband was an engineering major and I was like, 'I love a nerd!'

"So I really had the rug pulled out from under me because I was not expecting what happened that day. There's Sting, and then there's the shock and awe of being with him. And then there's my reaction — it was like a seven-car pileup emotionally.

"It wasn't intentional. But also, I didn't want to suck. I was trying to bring some dignity back to what I do. I'd be scared to watch the episode again.

"My sense is, Sting has got to be used to this. He's got to be used to this. I think he's one of those guys who walks down the street and he's so hot the flowers bloom. I think he's aware of who he is and what he brings to the table and how people respond to him.

"And listen, I go right on into the storm: I listened to Sting more after that. I have no shame in my game."

The takeaway ...

"It was impossible for me to prepare for how incredibly cool Sting is — whatever I had imagined, he completely blew that out of the water. So some days you just have to give into it and accept where you're at.

"There was nothing I could do. For me to try to cover up how starstruck I was would have been an effort in vain.

"It was also ridiculously humbling. I really thought I was unshakable, so it shocked me. I always feel like: I'm good, I'm professional, I show up, I'm prepared, I like what I bring to the table, usually people are happy with my work. But that day I was a mess.

"I made a complete and utter fool of myself — but that's OK."

IN PERFORMANCE 'Into the Breeches!' ★★

You'll see every laugh coming

Production is impressive, but script is a joke

By Chris Jones

LIZ LAUREN PHOTOS

Penny Slusher and cast perform in "Into the Breeches!" at Northlight Theatre at the North Shore Center for the Performing Arts in Skokie.

Might you find yourself a few steps ahead of the play at "Into the Breeches!," the new comedy from the Northlight Theatre? Is Winnetka north of Wilmette?

Actually, so formulaic is George Brant's new drama about an Evanston theater company in 1942, it sometimes feels like the playwright worked from a checklist, designed to get his play produced by as many progressive theaters as possible. And the problem with a guy crafting a comedy so tailored to some perceived orthodoxy of the moment, you start to wonder if there is not some self-serving element to the work, even if well-meaning.

Let us review. The local men are away at war and Maggie Dalton (Darci Nalepa) has been left behind to run the local Oberon Playhouse, with its love of Shakespearean histories and the Henry cycle on the docket. She has a Big Idea: cast all the male roles with women, playing so-called "breeches" parts. And so she sets about helping the women of the North Shore find the courage to wear the pants.

That's not a bad idea for a localized, slings-and-arrows comedy, of course, and the kind of material plowed by many a BBC sitcom over the years. The issue here is Brant writes so closely to type and then never once deviates from standard expectations. The auditionees include the local diva, Celeste Fielding (Hollis Resnik), whom you rapidly discern will need how to learn how to be supportive of her fellow women. There is June Bennett (Molly Hernandez), a Raw Talent who will need to find confidence. There's the board member (played by Fred Zimmerman), whose role is to huff and puff at the very horror of the idea before finally coming around. There's Grace Richards (Annie Munch), an undiscovered Big Talent who just needs her moment. And don't forget Winifred Snow (Penny Slusher), an Older Woman needing to gain sustenance from her young sisters.

Comedy is made up of types, Brant has written some funny shtick, and that's fine as far as it goes. I had more trouble with the character of the closeted gay stage manager (Mitchell Fain), whom I thought the play soon would oblige to wear a dress, since plays like this invariably oblige gay characters to wear dresses by intermission. (And he did. In great humor.) And then there is Ida Green (Penelope Walker), a costume designer who comes up from the "South Side," and who manages to persuade these women (in 1942!) to drop any and all racial prejudices, apparently after hearing Ida's stirring story for about two minutes and then thinking about it overnight. Granted, comedies don't generally dwell on the most hateful elements of our shared history, even in a progressive town like Evanston, but the perfunctory handling of this one was a bit much for me. Evanston had thousands of African American residents by the 1940s; Brant did not need to look elsewhere for his one non-white character.

Annie Munch, Molly Hernandez and cast in "Into the Breeches!"

To the happier news: this script gets a far better production that it really deserved, being stocked with so many big talents that you even start to understand why Northlight picked the piece as a showcase. This is a great role for Nalepa, who long has deserved more opportunity in Chicago theater and Munch is as genuinely formidable as Fain is warm, generous and charming. Actually, everyone is alive and enjoyable. And in director Jessica Thebus' uniformly skillful production, I was especially taken by the costumes created by Samantha C. Jones; they are rich and humorous enough to function as a hand-crafted character all on their own.

I don't think you will believe for a moment that you are in the real Evanston of 1942. You will just have to lighten up more than me.

IN PERFORMANCE 'Bloomsday' ★★★

Time-travel romance proves to be journey worth making

By Kerry Reid

MICHAEL COURIER PHOTO

Bryce Gangel and Jack DeCesare perform in "Bloomsday" by Remy Bumppo Theatre at Theater Wit.

Molly Bloom has come unstuck in time.

All right, not the real Molly Bloom. She's fictional, after all. But in Steven Dietz's 2015 time-travel romance, "Bloomsday," James Joyce's heroine is the inspiration for a young Dublin guide, Caithleen (Bryce Gangel), who takes tourists around the sites mentioned in "Ulysses."

But something is off on this day. An older American academic, Robert (Shawn Douglass), tells her that a young man will be joining her tour that day. He seems to know an awful lot about Caithleen and about what will happen when the young man shows up. He also dismisses Joyce's masterpiece as "an overpraised, under-read piece of doggerel" — even though he teaches it.

Meantime, young Robbie (Jack DeCesare) is frantically seeking a girl he's lost in St. Stephen's Green. An older woman, Cait (Annabel Armour), offers him freshly baked rolls and sympathy. She too seems to know an awful lot about him.

Well, you've probably figured out the device by now: Robert and Cait are the older versions of the youngsters who, 35 years earlier, met for one day and fell in love. It's not unlike Richard Linklater's 1995 film "Before Sunrise," which coincidentally (or perhaps not) takes place on June 16 — or Bloomsday for the literati.

But Dietz — who never met a twisty plot he didn't like — tosses in some darker hints of mental illness that complicate whether Robbie and Caithleen should take this apparent second chance to grab "the one who got away" and has haunted their respective lives ever since. Even if they don't know that it is that second chance.

Cait's had the tougher go of it since the long-ago day she spent with Robbie (who knew nothing about Joyce until joining that tour), and Armour's sly-yet-wistful performance is the standout in a solid quartet in director J.R. Sullivan's staging for Remy Bumppo.

She tells Gangel's Caithleen: "Asking a boy to see his future is asking a mole to see the stars." And indeed, Caithleen's flood of questions and imaginings about a future with Robbie — who comes from a working-class home in Renton, Wash. — do seem like the sort of thing that could send off alarms in a young guy with no clear sense of himself yet.

Both Dietz's story and Sullivan's staging take a while to get past the self-consciousness of the time-travel device, which feels like more of a time-tangle. Or perhaps it's parallel timelines that somehow manage to defy whatever rules guide these things and intersect. We understand quickly that these timelines are meshing, but the mechanisms for why that is happening aren't clear.

Paradoxically, although the Joyce tour also feels like a smarty-pants device, it takes on richer hues in the second act as we see young Robbie and Caithleen follow in the footsteps of Leopold Bloom, including a stop at Sweny's chemist shop, where Leopold bought lemon soap for his philandering wife. The streetscapes are captured in Yeaji Kim's projections, while Jack Magaw's set incorporates some subtle but effective mirroring of set pieces, suggesting the dual worlds of past and present colliding.

If you're resistant to the narrative underpinnings for Dietz's story, it's possible that you may, as Robert says, feel that you're "made of something cold" for not buying into the romance. But Gangel and DeCesare go a long way toward overcoming the inherent tweeness of the concept.

Even if you don't believe there's only one great love in each person's life, these two offer such charming performances that we root for them to figure it out.

And yet — what would that mean in the long run? Certainly, regrets are the dark matter of life.

At points, I wondered if Robert, like Samuel Beckett's Krapp, had kept a series of tapes recounting his one day with young Caithleen over and over again, much as Krapp remembers the young woman in a boat he let slip from his grasp decades before.

So it comes down to Armour's Cait, who is on the surface the least stable of the four elements in Dietz's dramaturgical alchemy, to provide clear-eyed understanding of how nothing is guaranteed to us.

"We prefer the ache," she says.

Perhaps so. But "Bloomsday" offers a bittersweet — if occasionally overstated — manifesto for seizing the day and love.

Or as Molly put it, "yes to say yes."

WATCH THIS: WEDNESDAY

Jason Beghe

"Chicago P.D." (9 p.m., NBC): The situation looks grim for the Intelligence team members in the Season 6 finale "Reckoning," as Kelton's (guest star John C. McGinley) victory in the election looks all but assured. If the corrupt politico prevails, it's all but certain that he'll eliminate the department that has made life more difficult for him, so Voight (Jason Beghe) and his detectives go "off book" in a last-ditch attempt to prevent that outcome.

"Chicago Med" (7 p.m., NBC): Dr. Charles (Oliver Platt) and his ex-wife, Caroline (recurring guest star Paula Newsome), move forward with some major plans in the Season 4 finale, "With a Brave Heart." Elsewhere, Agent Lee (recurring guest star Anna Enger Ritch) breaks some news to Will (Nick Gehlfuss) that could put his life in danger, and Ava (Norma Kuhling) fights desperately to hold onto her failing relationship with Connor (Colin Donnell).

"Live in Front of a Studio Audience: Norman Lear's All in the Family and The Jeffersons" (7 p.m., ABC): Co-produced by Jimmy Kimmel and iconic TV writer-producer Norman Lear, this audacious live special takes vintage scripts from Lear classics "All in the Family" and "The Jeffersons" and re-stages them with A-list contemporary actors in roles created by Carroll O'Connor, Jean Stapleton, Sherman Hemsley and Isabel Sanford.

"Southern Charm" (7 p.m., 10:30 p.m., Bravo): Cameran has a real come-to-Jesus moment with Eliza over the latter's ill-advised behavior at Patricia's dinner party in the new episode "Kat's Out of the Bag." Austen and Craig have lunch with Whitney, who's in the hot seat over some torrid rumors concerning his current relationship status.

"SEAL Team" (9 p.m., CBS): Will Bravo team be forced to disband? That depressing prospect certainly looks to be in the cards in the Season 2 finale, "Never Out of the Fight," as Cmdr. Shaw (recurring guest star Peter Jessop) indicates he's leaning toward taking such action. Fortunately, Jason (David Boreanaz) and his team have a final mission in which they hope they can prove him wrong.

"Whiskey Cavalier" (9 p.m., ABC): The diabolical Otlerman (Dylan Walsh) uses the life of Ray (Josh Hopkins) as leverage to force Will (Scott Foley) and his team to commit a terrorist attack for The Trust in the Season 1 finale "Czech Mate." Meanwhile, Jai (Vir Das) helps Standish (Tyler James Williams) through a rough patch with his girlfriend. Ana Ortiz also stars.

Rahm Emanuel is still Chicago's mayor — at least on 'Chicago Fire'

By Tracy Swartz
Chicago Tribune

That's a wrap!

Rahm Emanuel left office on Monday, but he will still be the mayor on Wednesday's Season 7 finale of "Chicago Fire." Emanuel filmed a Molly's bar scene with David Eigenberg — who plays firefighter Christopher Herrmann — in April at Cinespace Chicago Film Studios on the West Side.

NBC did not offer journalists an advance preview of the episode, which is scheduled to air at 8 p.m., and Eigenberg was mum about details when approached by the Tribune. He did say that Emanuel went off script while shooting their scene.

"Mayor Emanuel does as he sees fit. We started doing the scene, and I was like, 'Hey, Mr. Mayor.' And he was like, 'Hey, Herrmann.' The script didn't even say my name, which was actually a nice add. And then he went off, and I was like, OK, all right, here we go, all right, we're gonna go. He did some writing on his own, which I enjoyed because we don't get to do that at all, but the mayor gets to do what he wants," Eigenberg told the Tribune May 1 at an SOS Children's Villages Illinois media event at Cinespace.

An Emanuel spokeswoman said "Chicago Fire" executive producer Dick Wolf called Emanuel to ask that he play himself on the show. Emanuel made cameo appearances on "Chicago Fire" and "Chicago Med" years ago.

Wolf gushed about Emanuel during the annual "One Chicago" media event in Chicago in September. "I have never gotten the level of support from any other mayor that Rahm has given us since we came here to do the pilot (of 'Chicago Fire'). I like Rahm because you don't have to try and figure out what he's telling you. You may not like it, but you get a very straight response," Wolf told reporters.

NBC

Emanuel beefed up his TV resume as he prepared to leave office, so does Eigenberg think he has a future as an actor?

"Boy, he's not gonna get my job, I'll tell you that. He's gonna have to work really hard to get past me. Listen, you never know, acting's not brain surgery so my feeling has always been that just about anybody can do it," he said.

Roscoe Mitchell among 4 named NEA Jazz Masters

By Howard Reich
Chicago Tribune

Reedist-composer Roscoe Mitchell, a founding member of the Art Ensemble of Chicago and a prominent figure in the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM), has won a National Endowment for the Arts Jazz Masters Fellowship, widely considered the country's highest jazz honor.

Also named 2020 NEA Jazz Masters are vocalist Bobby McFerrin, bassist Reggie Workman and jazz advocate Dorthaan Kirk (who will receive the 2020 A.B. Spellman NEA Jazz Masters Fellowship for Jazz Advocacy).

Each will receive $25,000 and will be honored during a tribute concert April 2, 2020, at the SFJAZZ Center in San Francisco, in conjunction with SFJAZZ.

CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Roscoe Mitchell, performing at the Chicago Jazz Festival in 2017, has been named an NEA Jazz Master.

The club's Saturday night duplicate was well under way when Hard Luck Louie became declarer in today's deal.

Louie won the opening heart lead with dummy's ace and saw that the contract would make easily if the outstanding trumps split 2-2. The best chance other than that was to find West with the king of diamonds, so Louie crossed to his hand with the ace of spades and led a low diamond toward dummy. West stepped up with his king and led the queen of spades. Louie grabbed this with his king and led a low diamond to dummy's queen. He cashed dummy's ace of clubs and led another club. East won this with his jack and led a low heart to the 10 and king. Louie tried to ruff a club back to his hand, but West over-ruffed and led a heart to East's queen for down one. "Curse my luck," said Louie.

The bidding:

| North | East | South | West |
|---|---|---|---|
| 1♣ | Pass | 1♠ | Pass |
| 2♠ | Pass | 4♠ | All pass |

Opening lead: Jack of ♥

Lucky Larry declared the same contract with the same opening lead. He also won the first trick in dummy, led a spade to his ace, and then led a low diamond. When West rose with his king and led the queen of spades, Larry saw the potential problem and patiently ducked this trick. Another spade from West would have made life easy for Larry. West reverted to hearts, but Larry won with dummy's king, cashed the queen of diamonds, and crossed to his hand with the king of spades. A heart was discarded on the ace of diamonds and a heart ruff then gave Larry 10 tricks. Nicely played!

LOCAL FORECAST

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 83 | 63 |

■ A warm front pushes north across our area during the forenoon preceded by a band of showers and thunderstorms and followed by significant warming and gusty winds out of the south.

■ Lingering showers possible at daybreak, then becoming partly sunny.

■ Windy, much warmer and more humid by afternoon. Highs in lower 80s. E to SE winds at the start become more southerly, gusting well over 30 mph by afternoon.

■ Showers and t-storms likely overnight – winds shift to the NW.

NATIONAL FORECAST

Chicagoans will experience a huge temperature swing from Tuesday's high of 52 degrees to about 30 degrees warmer Wednesday. The high, which was 20 degrees below normal Tuesday, is expected to be about 10 degrees above normal Wednesday. Winds were gusting 30-40 mph out of the east off of Lake Michigan on Tuesday, while on Wednesday they will be shifting to the south gusting 30-40 mph. Overnight showers and thunderstorms will end early Wednesday, then redevelop that night.

It looks like temperatures will top out in the lower 80s again Thursday, Friday and Saturday before a cool-down begins Sunday.

Indications are Chicago will face periodic showers and thunderstorms for the next few days— thus rivers may run fairly high and farmers will continue to struggle to work the fields.

THURSDAY, MAY 23

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 80 | 60 |

Partly sunny, breezy winds out of the NW and warm. Afternoon highs in the upper 70s to lower 80s. Clouding up at night with a good chance of showers and t-storms – winds become easterly.

FRIDAY, MAY 24

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 83 | 67 |

Showers and t-storms early then a chance again later afternoon and overnight. Some sun in the afternoon allows temps to warm into the lower 80s. Winds become SW gusting over 20 mph. A chance of t-storms overnight.

SATURDAY, MAY 25

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 80 | 55 |

Another warm day. Sunshine mixes with scattered cloud cover to help raise temperatures. Highs from mid 70s to low 80s. Scattered t-storms focus along a weak front as it moves into the area. Winds shift east; cooler at night.

SUNDAY, MAY 26

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 63 | 47 |

Cooler as east winds return. Highs in the 60s – cooler at the lakefront. T-storms possible almost anytime but best chance overnight.

MONDAY, MAY 27

| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 63 | 47 |

Memorial Day. Mostly cloudy . Periods of showers or t-storms possible. An easterly component to the winds will keep temps cooler especially near the lake. Afternoon highs in the 60s. Chance of t-storms overnight.

TUESDAY, MAY 28

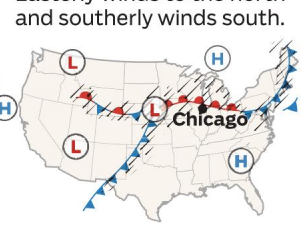
| HIGH | LOW |
|---|---|
| 70 | 57 |

Mostly cloudy and warmer. A good chance of showers or t-storms early and then later in the afternoon and evening. Temps: 60s far north to 80s far south. Easterly winds to the north and southerly winds south.



NOTE: Predicted high/low temps on Tribune weather page are chronological—the "high" refers to maximum reading expected during day and "low" is the minimum reading expected the following night.

ASK TOM

Dear Tom,

I have noticed that clouds sometimes form over the tops of Chicago's downtown buildings. Why?

Orlin Sanders
Chicago

Dear Orlin,

These building-induced clouds have caught my eye as well over the years. They form here in Chicago much as orographic (mountain-induced) clouds do, but on a smaller scale, when easterly winds are blowing, temperatures are cool and the humidity is high. Buildings obstruct air flow, just as mountains do. Winds are forced to flow over or around them. Remember that the atmosphere generally cools with height. In situations in which the air is moist but not quite saturated, forcing the wind to ascend over tall buildings can be just enough to cool the air to saturation and initiate cloud development. It's a spectacular demonstration of man-made weather and it is fascinating to observe.

Safe Haven families react to another abandoned baby in Chicago area

By Kate Thayer
Chicago Tribune

When Tera Naset heard about a newborn baby abandoned May 7 in a Northwest Side alley — named Patrick Casey Doe after the first responders who helped save his life — it hit her hard.

If things had gone differently, that could've been her son, Frankie.

Almost exactly one year before police say baby Doe was left in an alley by his teenage parents, a woman walked into a Chicago hospital and handed an employee Frankie, wrapped in a blanket, explaining she had just given birth that morning, Naset said. She then declined medical care and left.

The woman, who remains anonymous, could do so legally because of the state's Abandoned Newborn Infant Protection Act, commonly referred to as the Safe Haven Law. Her decision that day set into motion a path that led Frankie, within days, to the Naset family, who then formally adopted him.

Baby Doe, who was eventually retrieved from the alley by his grandmother and then taken to a fire station, had to be resuscitated and was without oxygen for an extended time. He was hospitalized and now is in the foster care system. His young parents, whom the Tribune is not naming because they are juveniles, face attempted murder charges, and his grandmother Karla Antimo is charged with felony disorderly conduct after police say she lied about how she found the baby.

Safe Haven Law advocates point out the contrast between babies turned over at Safe Haven sites, which in Illinois include any hospital, fire station, police station or emergency medical services provider, and those left in alleys and garbage cans — cast away in what most likely is a desperate, troubled situation. Experts say those who abandon a baby most likely feel they have no choice and are not thinking clearly. But Safe Haven advocates hope continued outreach and education about the law will ensure it's common knowledge, so those who feel they have no choice make a safer one.

Many abandoned babies don't survive, said Dawn Geras, president of the Chicago-based Save Abandoned Babies Foundation, the group that lobbied for the law, enacted in 2001. And those who do are placed in the oft-troubled foster care system. Safe Haven babies, however, find their "forever home," she said.

Since the publicity of baby Doe in the past week, Geras said another baby was "saved under the law," bringing the total to 132 babies relinquished in the state since the law went into effect. That baby is now on the path to adoption, she said.

Geras and several of the families who have adopted Safe Haven babies say they're devastated when they hear that a baby has been abandoned. In the almost 19 years since the law was enacted, 83 additional babies were abandoned, not using the law, Geras said. More than half of those babies did not survive.

"Each time, it breaks my heart," she said. "You don't get used to a baby being abandoned. Each one feels worse than the last one, knowing the law is there and knowing people should know about the law but don't."

Through her foundation, Geras spreads the word about the law, which the state mandates be taught in middle and high school health classes. She also brings together the families who have adopted Safe Haven babies. They gather each summer for a picnic, the kids calling each other "Safe Haven cousins," Geras said.

Had Frankie's birth mother not known about the law, Naset wonders what would have happened to her son. She said her family is reminded of that every time there's news of an abandoned baby, but because last week's discovery was so close to Frankie's first birthday, it was especially emotional.

"You remember what it's like to just want a baby so badly, and there's not any way to make it go faster," she said. "You accept that. But to hear somebody did give up their baby, but in the wrong way ...

Dermatologists urge caution with medical apps

By Kate Thayer
Chicago Tribune

While snapping a photo of a suspicious mole with a phone and uploading it to an app might seem like the swiftest way to a diagnosis, dermatologists say users should be wary of such technology, especially when it comes to screening for skin cancer.

Several apps allow users to provide a list of symptoms and an image of their skin, whether it be a changing mole or an itchy rash, and submit it — for a fee — to an online dermatologist. That dermatologist can then recommend a cream, provide information on how to watch a benign-looking mole, or suggest making an appointment for an in-person biopsy with a local dermatologist.

The practice is called teledermatology, and it's not only prevalent in smartphone app stores. Dermatologists say this practice is used in their profession, especially in rural or underserved areas where patients don't have the opportunity to visit a dermatologist's office.

But with more apps popping up, doctors warn users to be cautious, even if the convenience is tempting.

"There's a huge spectrum in the apps — this is the problem," said Dr. Carrie Kovarik, associate professor of dermatology at the University of Pennsylvania. "It's difficult to know what's good, what's not, what they do, who's

Many middle-income seniors in a tough spot

Soaring costs to outpace resources, researchers say

By Victoria Knight

DREAMSTIME

Seniors with incomes from $25,000 to $74,000 are often overlooked by policymakers and legislators, a recent study found.

In 10 years, more than half of middle-income Americans age 75 or older will not be able to afford to pay for yearly assisted living rent or medical expenses, according to a study published recently in Health Affairs.

The researchers used demographic and income data to project estimates of a portion of the senior population, those who will be 75 or older in 2029, with a focus on those in the middle-income range — currently $25,001 to $74,298 per year for those ages 75 to 84.

And it doesn't look good for that group because of the rising costs of housing and health care. The researchers estimated that the number of middle-income elders in the U.S. will nearly double, growing from 7.9 million to 14.4 million by 2029. They will make up the biggest share of seniors, at 43 percent.

By 2029, more than half of the middle-income seniors will have annual financial resources of $60,000 or less, even if the equity in their homes is included. Projections put the average annual assisted living and medical expenses cost in 10 years at $62,000, meaning that a majority of the middle-income seniors then will not be able to afford an assisted living facility.

Middle-income seniors are a group that Beth Burnham Mace, one of the study's authors, said has been often overlooked when policymakers and legislators think about housing and care for aging Americans.

"The low-income cohort has been taken care of by tax subsidies, while the high-income cohort is largely self-sufficient. But the middle-income seniors have been ignored," said Mace, who is chief economist at the National Investment Center for Seniors Housing and Care, a nonprofit research group.

The study's authors said they are probably underestimating the extent of the looming problem. They projected out-of-pocket medical costs of only $5,000 a year for seniors.

Deborah Carr, chairwoman of the department of sociology at Boston University who studies aging, noted that Americans "are able to live longer today than they have in the past because of medical technology." The downside, said Carr, who was not affiliated with the study, is "if they're living for years with dementia or mobility issues, then they have to pay longer for medical care for the additional years they live."

Indeed, the researchers projected that 60 percent of the middle-income seniors will have mobility limitations, while 20 percent will be considered "high needs," meaning they have three or more chronic conditions and one or more limitations in activities of daily living, such as bathing or dressing. Eight percent will have some form of cognitive impairment.

Seniors living with mobility limitations, chronic conditions or cognitive impairment are more likely to need care and support such as that offered by an assisted living facility.

But that's not a reality for many.

In her written response to the Health Affairs study, Jennifer Molinsky, a senior research associate at the Joint Center for Housing Studies at Harvard University, addressed the needs of seniors who decide to stay at home instead of going to an assisted living facility. She said these older Americans face a different set of challenges.

"One of the challenges is that most people don't live in cities," Molinsky said in an interview. "And most houses in these areas are single-family detached homes. The infrastructure is not set up for safe walking, so you have to drive. People often give up driving as they age. So these locations can be difficult to provide services to people."

Molinsky said other issues to consider are making homes more accessible by adding ramps for wheelchairs or wall handles in the shower and the cost of these changes.

The other dire warning of the study: While spouses and middle-age daughters have historically provided the bulk of elder care, that is a less likely option in the future because of changing marriage patterns, lower birthrates and the increasing number of adult children who live far from their parents. Some seniors will need to seek paid care.

The study suggests that policymakers could expand Medicare benefits to include access to a wider range of supportive services, or create a new benefit, "Medicare Part E," that funds long-term care. However, other attempts to set up such a program have run into resistance among lawmakers because of cost.

While Medicaid is the primary payer of long-term nursing home care, right now the program is available only to low-income seniors. Seniors may become eligible if they impoverish themselves. However, lawmakers also could broaden the Medicaid income eligibility requirements or expand options to include home-based care for those with higher-end incomes.

on the other side."

If the app is created by a medical provider, that's usually a good sign, Kovarik said. That way, users can be sure who is on the other side, and if they need a follow-up appointment, the app can connect them.

Many apps "often don't close that loop of care," she said. "If you need to be seen in person, a lot of times those (apps) don't have ability to get you to the next step."

But Dr. Alexander Börve, a California-based orthopedic surgeon who developed one of these apps, called First Derm, said users of his app are able to take feedback from the dermatologists consulting for his product and use it to get an appointment sooner at their local provider. "We are very good at triaging skin conditions."

The app also isn't as daunting for users as going to the doctor, and provides useful information about skin conditions and what to look for, he said.

"When we're not 100% sure, we are very transparent," he said of opinions on suspicious moles. "We recommend you go in, and a dermatologist will take a skin biopsy."

Börve said health insurance companies do not include apps like his in their coverage, but he has kept his prices to around the cost of a co-pay. First Derm services range from about $30 to $60, depending on how fast a user wants results, which can take up to two days, or just hours, he said.

Dr. Elizabeth Fahrenbach, a dermatologist at North Branch Dermatology on the Northwest Side and at Amita Health Resurrection Medical Center, said she's skeptical about using apps, specifically for patients worried about skin cancer. May is Skin Cancer Awareness Month.

Fahrenbach said that although she appreciates teledermatology in some situations for skin conditions like acne or eczema, she worries it can provide a false sense of security to patients looking to be checked for skin cancer, including melanoma. "It doesn't take the place of a dermatologist."

"Specifically for moles, it makes me nervous. Melanoma can be so varied in its presentation," she said. And the app "relies on the patient to notice an abnormal thing first."

Fahrenbach said that often her patients will come in for a skin check, worried about a mole or spot they've noticed on their body, but in doing the check, Fahrenbach will notice other things that need to be further examined. "That (mole is) benign, but there's something they didn't even notice."

"That's a pretty common phenomenon; an app isn't going to address that issue," she added. And "it's unrealistic to take a picture of every mole on your body and send it in. You might as well go to the doctor."

it just tears you apart."

Naset, 33, and her husband, John, 34, decided to adopt children when they learned they couldn't conceive on their own. First they adopted their daughter Madeleine, now 3, in a more traditional adoption: Madeleine's birth mother chose the Nasets through an agency during the pregnancy.

When the Nasets decided it was time to adopt another child, Naset said they had a longer wait. After 15 months, they got a call from the adoption agency, telling them a baby had been relinquished under the Safe Haven Law. The next day, they met their son, named Francis after Naset's late father.

"He's a riot," Naset said of Frankie, a happy, active baby who loves to laugh and play with balls and with his big sister.

Christie Haack, 44, said she knew instantly when she got the call from her adoption agency that a baby girl had been relinquished at a fire department. "My husband didn't even look at me and said, 'Yeah, this baby's ours.' We just knew."

Trinity, now 4, was the 100th Safe Haven baby in the state. The Haack family, who recently moved from Roselle to Florida, had trouble conceiving their son, now 9, eventually using in vitro fertilization, but then decided to turn to adoption to complete their family.

After waiting 18 months, Haack grew worried and frustrated. She said she bargained with God, setting deadlines for when her baby would come. Finally, they got the call.

"A week after she came home, I remember holding her, thinking, I'm finally complete," said Haack, who has since started working for the Save Abandoned Babies Foundation.

"I want to help other women in crisis realize this law does work," she said. "They can have peace of mind knowing their child is safe. They can have peace of mind knowing there's that anonymity."

Tera Naset prepares for bedtime with her son, Frankie, 1, at their Logan Square home.

When a parent turns over a baby — within 30 days of birth — to a Safe Haven site, the baby is hospitalized, and employees there notify the Illinois Department of Children and Family Services, said DCFS spokesman Jassen Strokosch. DCFS then calls adoption agencies throughout the state, on a rotating basis, who soon take custody of the baby and contact a family, asking if they'd like to adopt the child, he said. Unlike abandoned babies, these children do not go into DCFS custody.

While the birth parents have 60 days to reverse their decision and could petition the court to gain the baby back, Strokosch said that's rare in Safe Haven cases, and it's a "smooth" road to adoption.

Downers Grove police Chief Shanon Gillette and his wife, Debi, of Bolingbrook, adopted their youngest daughter, Ella, now 11, after she was dropped off at a Chicago hospital. Debi Gillette said that, like many Safe Haven babies, Ella knows the circumstances surrounding her adoption.

"We've told her as much info as we have, truly since the beginning," she said. "She had a birth mom who loved her so much that she made a choice. Our message to her is not that she's abandoned. It was just a very loving use of a very special law where we take care of babies when their birth mothers don't know what else to do."

Debi Gillette said she cried when she heard about baby Doe. "My heart also broke for just the agony and the despair that that birth mother would've gone through."

Mark Reinecke, chief of psychology at Northwestern Memorial Hospital, said that although it's impossible to know what's going through the minds of any parents who abandon their babies, in times of extreme stress, people act in irrational ways. Even more so for those in their teenage years with still developing, immature brains.

"When you experience a high level of anxiety, it narrows your focus on the problem directly in front of you," Reinecke said. "You want it to go away immediately."

Problems are magnified, and even if social supports are there, they do little good if the person doesn't realize help exists, he said. "You can't help yourself if you don't know help is available."

Focusing on 'swimsuit season' is a bad strategy

Set eating, exercise goals based on your values, not looks

By Carrie Dennett
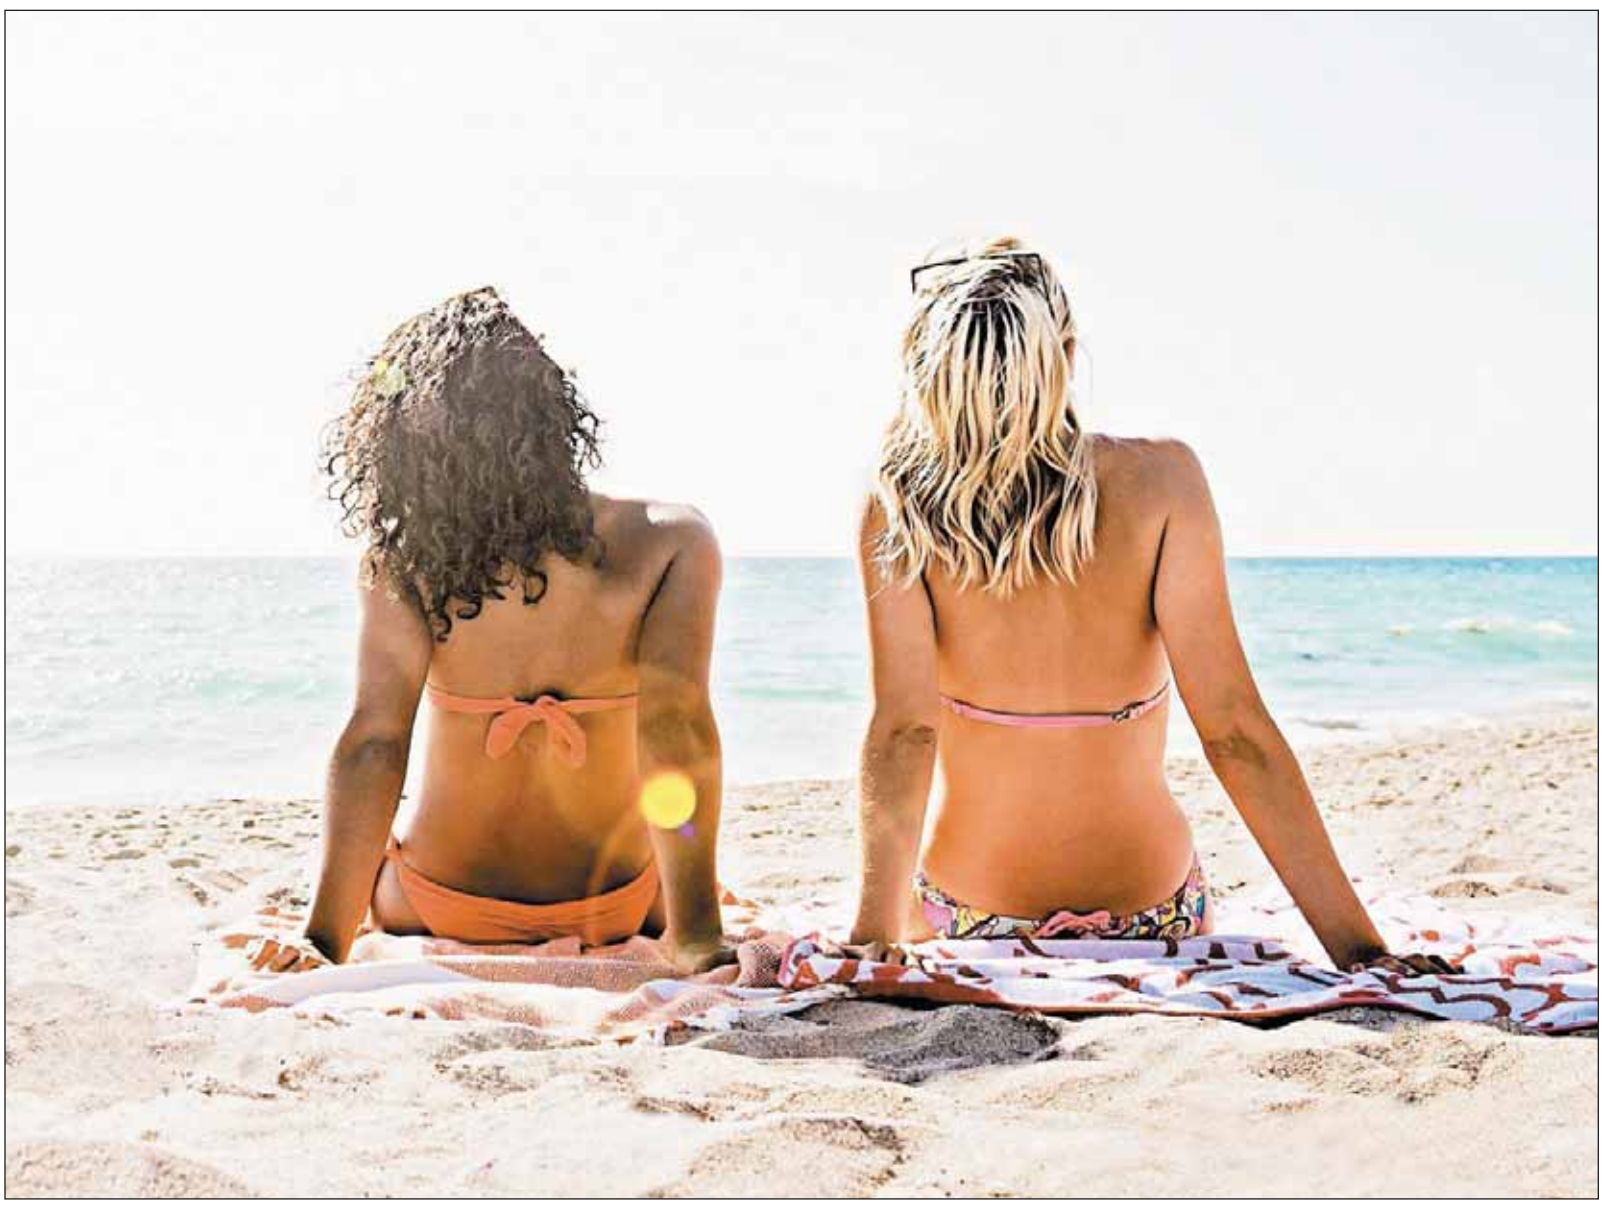
The Washington Post



GETTY

Science shows us that "X days till summer!" reminders won't help you change your habits if you're primarily focused on how you'll look in your swimsuit.

It's May, which means heavy sweaters have been shed and skin is starting to show.

The arrival of summer comes second to only New Year's as the calendar event that spurs us to eat healthier and be more active. But science shows us that all the "X days till summer!" reminders in the world won't help you change your eating and exercise habits if you're primarily focused on how you'll look in your bathing suit.

If you want to form habits that stick around long after the return of cool weather, your motivation to eat better and get in shape needs to be based on something you deeply value — such as having enough strength, stamina and energy to hike your favorite trails with your family. Real change comes when you make changes based on who you are, not on how you think you will be perceived. Here's why envisioning what you will look like once you're "bathing suit ready" (a suggestion: Put on a bathing suit and you're ready!) or when you make an entrance at your high school reunion isn't the motivator you think it is.

Attempting to change your behavior and appearance to earn the approval of others taps into something researchers call "social identity threat." Here's how that works: If you see yourself as overweight or unfit, or believe others see you that way, it becomes part of your social identity. When you fear being rejected, devalued or judged because of negative stereotypes about this aspect of your identity, this feels threatening and leads to stress, anxiety, lower self-esteem and increased self-consciousness. Ironically, this can make you want to avoid going to the gym to avoid scrutiny. It may also contribute to unhealthy eating behaviors as you try to escape your emotional discomfort.

Though research suggests that visualizing yourself from an outside perspective can be motivating for straightforward goals — envisioning people seeing you vote makes it more likely you'll actually vote, for example — that might hinder your pursuit of more complex health-related goals, including nutrition and exercise. That's because our health isn't entirely under our control, and seeing results requires consistent, ongoing effort and a deeper level of behavior change.

If you find yourself struggling, you're more likely to abandon an appearance-related goal, because it becomes little more than a source of stress. Conversely, when you struggle with a goal central to who you are, you're more likely to persist because you see the goal as challenging but essential. This is where values come in.

What does it mean to make choices that align with your values? A quick online search for "values list" will yield dozens, if not hundreds, of examples, many of which relate — directly or indirectly — to health, nutrition and fitness. Take independence. If you value being independent, you can take actions every day to preserve that independence. For example, eating well and exercising regularly can help keep you strong and prevent chronic disease.

Or let's say you actively seek novel and stimulating experiences, particularly exploring new places around the world. Your values would include adventure and curiosity. Eating well and staying physically active will help you align with those values because it's easier to travel if you feel good, can walk for miles, and can easily hoist your luggage into overhead bins and up flights of stairs. One of the major reasons I enjoy long, brisk walks and weightlifting is because I view it as training for international travel.

Setting goals based on what you deeply value goes beyond achieving something — such as a desired weight or clothing size — so you can check off the "done" box. It's about making decisions that align with who you are and how you want to be. You can live your values every day, even if your goal feels far away. And when your actions match your values, you can continue to behave that way, regardless of whether you reach your goal. Your values have no endpoint, so acting based on your values won't either.

As retirement nears, my new mantra is 'So what?'

Chris Erskine
The Middle Ages

For me, retirement will be a verb. In a couple more years, I'm going to find a small town in North Carolina and join the volunteer fire department.

I can save lives. And I can keep active, while making new friends. And maybe I can finally drive a firetruck, a lifelong obsession. There are a few universal male dreams: playing quarterback, opening a bar, driving a firetruck — honk! Honk!! HONK!!!

That tells you pretty much all you need to know about the male mind.

There is a boyishness to a well-made man that helps him endure a lifetime of mundane daily obligation. It's not selfishness; it's survival.

In North Carolina, I can hang out with my pal, Dan, who has moved his family there. For Dan, clever banter is a food group. We'll toast the weekends with a glass or two of Southern shellac (bourbon).

I'll also buy an old rowboat. I'll anchor it in the middle of a rural lake and take long naps in the Southern sun. If I forget to fish, so what? If the old boat sinks, so what?

That's my new mantra: "So what?"

You can apply "so what" to almost any situation. Forget to brush the dogs? So what? Forget to water the Christmas poinsettia that refuses to die? So what? Moron on a motorcycle rakes off your side mirror? So what? At our age, you never look back anyway.

I've found "So what?" to be my version of "Don't sweat the small stuff."

Like, the other day, I forgot to start the dishwasher. As I told the kid, Sports Illustrated makes a very stylish dinner plate.

"Forget to start the dishwasher again?" he asked.

"Soooooooooo what!" I said.

This kid. He went away recently for spring break, packed quickly, like he was breaking out of prison. Men hate to pack, and my 16-year-old son is nearly that — a man, with occasional bursts of boyishness.

"Bye, Dad," he said at the airport.

As he left, I got the first bad buzz of empty-nesthood, a profoundly life-changing condition for a generation of parents who have probably over-invested in our kids.

When he leaves for college in two years, my only dependents will be these idiot dogs, one of which might be a wolf. Since early April, the demi-wolf has been shedding tiny finches of fur that I constantly chase around with a broom, trying to keep them out of the salad.

The other dog is even worse, an insolent 300-pound Satan.

Certainly, I want to find a retirement that will make them both happy.

Empty-nesting is suddenly a disease in our little suburb. My attorney, Billable Bob, just announced he is moving way west, near Ventura, joining Goldberg. My buddies Gino and Dave have empty-nested to Manhattan Beach — Camelot on steroids.

For me, a college town is probably a better fit: Madison, Oxford, Ann Arbor. College towns are the best towns, sporting a naive (almost silly) idealism, beer bongs and enormous marching bands (America's greatest cultural achievement).

Look, Los Angeles has been very good to us. When I eventually drive off, I will cry the first 100 miles.

So why go? Lots of memories in our little honky-tonk house, yet also a haunting sadness. My late wife, Posh, got some junk mail the other day from a mail-order company she used frequently.

The card read: "We miss you! Come back and get 25 percent off!"

So sweet of them to reach out like that.

For the record, the kids and I really miss her too. If she came back, we would give her a full 30 percent discount. Heck, we'd probably give her 35 percent off if she agreed to make us one of her famous Italian feasts.

What am I running from? That.

And the local baseball fields where my older son's ghost still steals second base. I see his goofy freckled grin in every dugout. I'm running from ghosts and once-good memories that now hurt like clouds of wasps.

I'm also running — to be sure — toward better times ahead.

A new location might also help me finish the novel I've been grinding away on. It's really coming together. I'm now almost 400 words into the 90,000-word manuscript. At this pace, I'll finish by the year 2099.

So what.

The novel is called "Celebrity Blood," a title my buddy Jeff suggested. It's about an exclusive blood bank reserved for the rich and famous, and the shenanigans surrounding it.

So when I'm not napping in my rowboat or saving lives on a firetruck, I'll be finishing up "Celebrity Blood," the first book where you'll actually root for the vampires to drink up all the humans.

A wake-up call on sleeping pills

By David Lazarus
Los Angeles Times

DREAMSTIME

The FDA is requiring a new warning on the most commonly prescribed sleeping pills.

Americans take millions of sleeping pills every year — a sign, many experts say, that human beings weren't designed to live in a wired world of constant stimulation.

All those highly addictive pills, meanwhile, have potentially serious side effects. So the Food and Drug Administration stepped up with a warning.

"Rare but serious injuries have happened with certain common prescription insomnia medicines," the agency said, including while people are "sleepwalking, sleep driving, and engaging in other activities while not fully awake."

The FDA is now requiring that the most commonly prescribed sleeping pills carry a notice that these meds may be more dangerous than people realize. It singled out Ambien, Lunesta and Sonata as being particularly worrisome.

How serious is the problem? Government researchers found 66 cases of "complex sleep behaviors occurring with these medicines over the past 26 years that resulted in serious injuries, including death," the agency said.

"These cases included accidental overdoses, falls, burns, near drowning, exposure to extreme cold temperatures leading to loss of limb, carbon monoxide poisoning, drowning, hypothermia, motor vehicle collisions with the patient driving, and self-injuries such as gunshot wounds and apparent suicide attempts," it said.

"Patients usually did not remember these events."

We're becoming a nation of Jason Bournes, but without all the cool stuff. All because we can't get enough shut-eye.

Jerome Siegel, a sleep researcher at UCLA, told me there's no question we're overdoing it with use of powerful chemicals to knock ourselves into a stupor.

"There are situations where short-term use of sleeping pills might be helpful," he said. "But even that's debatable. If you ask me, no one should be taking sleeping pills."

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, as many as 70 million Americans "suffer from sleep disorders or deprivation." An estimated 4% of U.S. adults are taking prescription meds to help them sleep at any given time, the CDC says. That's 10 million people.

They're spending roughly $2 billion a year, with millions of dollars more going toward over-the-counter drugs and dietary supplements such as melatonin.

Needless to say, this is a golden opportunity for drug companies, which have built multimillion-dollar marketing campaigns around the notion that everyone deserves a decent night's rest.

A spokeswoman for Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, the drug industry's main trade group, declined to comment.

The dirty little secret of the sleeping-pill business is that the drugs don't in fact fix anything. If you have chronic sleep issues, they'll probably return as soon as you stop taking the meds.

"For acute or short-term insomnia, prescription sleeping medications taken for a week or two can be helpful in breaking the cycle of poor sleep but should not be used for chronically poor sleep," said Clete A. Kushida, a Stanford University neurologist who specializes in sleep disorders.

A 2007 study financed by the National Institutes of Health found that sleeping pills helped people nod off just 13 minutes faster than placebos, and they increased total sleep time by only about 11 minutes.

A much smarter move, experts say, is to practice what's called good "sleep hygiene."

To a large extent, that simply means using common sense.

Limit daytime naps to no more than 30 minutes. Get some exercise.

Avoid stimulants such as caffeine or nicotine before bedtime.

UCLA's Siegel advised taking control of your sleep pattern by getting up at the same time every day, even on weekends.

Legs no longer restless after acupuncture therapy

By Joe Graedon and Teresa Graedon
King Features Syndicate

SUSAN RAGAN/AP 1995

Studies have shown that acupuncture can provide relief to sufferers of restless legs syndrome.

Q. I had restless legs syndrome for many years and took ropinirole (Requip) to treat it. The medication worked, but it caused me many worrying symptoms on a regular basis: dizziness, nausea, feeling like I was going to pass out, even vomiting at times. However, if I didn't take the drug, I couldn't sleep because my legs started acting up the minute I laid down in bed.

I accepted this until I saw an acupuncturist. This woman cured me after only one visit. I'll never forget that day, three years ago, when she needled my body and left the room. I felt strong movements of energy throughout my body and was so tired after that initial treatment that I went to bed as soon as I got home. I never took Requip again.

A. Many people would prefer to use some method other than medication to control their restless legs syndrome. A review of nonpharmacological interventions found that acupuncture reduces RLS symptoms (Disability and Rehabilitation, March 21, 2018). Your results are surprising in that you got such long-lasting relief. Other people may find that they need to continue with acupuncture to maintain freedom from RLS symptoms.

Q. In all the time I've read your column, I haven't seen pineapple juice mentioned as a cure for hiccups. It works with one sip!

A. People use many remedies for hiccups, ranging from eating an olive to sipping pickle juice or sucking on a lemon wedge with Angostura bitters sprinkled on it. We suspect that these approaches may work by activating transient receptor potential channels in nerves.

Hiccups are triggered by a misfiring of the vagus nerve, which causes an involuntary contraction of the diaphragm. Activating TRP channels might reverse this. We have not seen any studies of whether or how pineapple juice might affect these channels.

Q. My grandmother taught me that bee stings would relieve arthritis for an extended time. Do you have any information regarding that?

A. Dr. Philipp Terc wrote about bee venom therapy (apitherapy) in 1888, when he published "About a Peculiar Connection Between the Bee Stings and Rheumatism." In 1935, Dr. Bodog Beck wrote a book titled "Bee Venom Therapy." It detailed the application of bee stings to treat arthritis and other inflammatory conditions.

A recent study used bee venom to treat experimentally induced arthritis in rats (Toxicon, Apr. 1, 2019). The scientists found that honeybee venom has a range of anti-inflammatory properties. It may be an effective option for reducing inflammation in rheumatoid arthritis. Dose is critical, however, and low doses appear to be more effective.

Some people are highly allergic to honeybee venom and may die from anaphylactic shock if they are stung. Skilled practitioners must be prepared for such emergencies.

Q. Sometimes people write to you about nasal congestion at night. This happened frequently to me until I started using SnoreCare nasal vents.

A. It comes as no surprise that nasal congestion could interfere with nighttime breathing (European Archives of Oto-Rhino-Laryngology, September 2011). Doctors generally prescribe steroid nasal sprays such as Flonase or a CPAP machine for such problems. However, nasal vents or nasal strips such as Breathe Right can improve nasal breathing (Pulmonary Medicine, Dec. 13, 2016).

Kebabs make it a party

3 marinades for 3 meats in time for Memorial Day grilling

By Robin Mather | Chicago Tribune

Whatever the weather, Memorial Day weekend opens grilling season. Steaks, chicken, burgers and hot dogs will grace the grill through summer's sultry afternoons and long, soft evenings.

For special occasions, though, offering kebabs will please everyone at the table. Though they're a little fussy to make, kebabs invariably delight diners. What is it about dinner on a stick?

We have marinades suitable for beef, lamb and shrimp, with suggestions for sauces and side dishes that will make your grilling adventure a success.

First, a couple of tips. Skewer meat and vegetables separately. Although the ready-made kebabs offered at grocery store meat counters look appealing, meat and vegetables cook at different speeds. Putting them on the same skewer will mean underdone meat and perfect vegetables — or perfect meat and overdone vegetables. Cherry tomatoes always seem to fall off during cooking.

Leave a bit of space between the pieces when you skewer them so each can cook to perfection.

Vegetable kebabs don't have to be limited to peppers, zucchini, cherry tomatoes and onion. Try making mushroom skewers, mixing portobello, cremini, white button and shiitake. Or consider ratatouille skewers of Japanese eggplant rounds, zucchini, jarred roasted peppers and onion chunks. Squash skewers could include chopped butternut squash — buy the pre-cut stuff at the grocery, and precook it until it can just be pierced with a fork — as well as zucchini and yellow squash. Crucifer skewers of blanched cauliflower, broccoli florets and Brussels sprouts sweeten when grilled. Mix suitable fruits with vegetables if you like; pineapple's a good choice, as are peaches.

How the shrimp cocktail owes its origins to oysters

By Nick Kindelsperger
Chicago Tribune

It doesn't matter if you're sitting swell in a fancy steakhouse or crowded around a booth at any random bar and grill in America, order a shrimp cocktail in 2019 and you have a fair idea about what's coming: a collection of plump shrimp perched along the perimeter of a wide glass, with cocktail sauce poured in the middle. Grab a shrimp, dip it in the sweet and — depending on the amount of horseradish within — spicy red sauce and feast.

Though millions of dinners have started this way, stare long enough at the dish and you'll eventually realize that so much about the shrimp cocktail makes so little sense. How did the name of a spirit-heavy drink become affixed to a nonalcoholic sauce? Why is it often presented in a glass instead of in a bowl or on a plate? And why do we go mad for the stuff, even though cocktail sauce is mostly bulked out with ketchup? How can the condiment Chicagoans proudly declare unfit to touch a hot dog make perfect sense when paired with pricey seafood?

I'm not the first to question the culinary merits of cocktail sauce. James Beard, the acclaimed mid-20th-century cookbook author whose name now graces a foundation and the national culinary awards, referred to cocktail sauce as the "red menace" in his book "James Beard's Simple Foods." His disdain is palpable, as he describes it as "a dreadful invention loaded with tomato and garlic and onion that, to my mind, is the worst thing that ever happened to the oyster."

While you may or may not agree with his assessment, he is right about one thing: Cocktail sauce used to be more closely associated with oysters than with shrimp. It wasn't until the 20th century and modern freezing technology that shrimp became

Kebabs

Whatever your vegetable skewer choices, cook them on a cooler area of the grill, and brush them as they cook with olive oil warmed with crushed garlic, a pinch of salt and freshly ground black pepper.

Plan on one to two skewers of meat or shrimp and one of vegetables for each guest. But you don't have to serve the vegetables on the skewers. Slide the cooked vegetables off onto a platter, and everyone can have some of everything.

Whether you choose wooden or metal skewers, select long ones rather than short. Doing so gives the chef a cooler part of the skewer to use as a handle, which makes turning the kebabs easier.

Kebabs cook quickly, so you'll need to baby-sit them at the grill, turning them frequently.

Lime-marinated skirt or flank steak pairs nicely with saffron rice and a sauce of harissa or Sriracha thinned with Greek yogurt to soften its fierce heat. We like skirt and flank steak for their intensely beefy flavor, but there's a trick to these sometimes-tough cuts. Slice them across the grain and at an oblique angle — aim for about a 45-degree angle. The strips will be wider, and more tender to the tooth.

If lamb kebabs are your choice, the herby Yemeni sauce called z'hug complements lamb's richness and stands up to the flavors of its robust marinade. Serve on a bed of regular or Israeli couscous — the multicolored large couscous makes an attractive plate.

Shrimp marinated in white wine with orange juice and zest, green onion, crushed garlic and black pepper, then wrapped in bacon before skewering offers a fresh, citrusy flavor profile with smoky overtones. The traditional Mississippi favorite comeback sauce is a fine companion (and it's easy to make).

Steamed or boiled rice dressed with a profusion of chopped fresh herbs — parsley, cilantro, marjoram, thyme, summer savory or a mix are good choices — would set off the plate beautifully.

Robin Mather is a longtime food journalist and the author of "The Feast Nearby," a collection of essays and recipes from a year of eating locally on a very strict budget.

Bacon-shrimp kebabs

Prep: 35 minutes Marinate: 1 hour Cook: 4-8 minutes Makes: 4 servings

The acidity of the white wine and orange juice will "cook" the shrimp — just like ceviche — if the shrimp marinates too long, so let them rest for no more than 2 hours. The bacon's smokiness echoes in the comeback sauce, enhancing the shrimp's citrusy flavor. Zest the orange before juicing it.

½ cup dry white wine (an oaky chardonnay would be a good choice) or vermouth

Zest and juice of 1 large navel orange

6 green onions, white and green parts, thinly sliced

3 cloves garlic, smashed, peeled

1 teaspoon each: ground cumin, coarse salt, freshly ground pepper

1 ½ pounds (size 21-25) shrimp

1 pound smoked bacon

Comeback sauce, see recipe

1. Combine olive oil, wine, orange zest and juice, green onions, garlic, cumin, salt and pepper in a gallon zip-close bag. Add the shrimp, seal the top and knead briefly to make sure all shrimp contact the marinade. Refrigerate, 1 to 2 hours, turning once.

2. At cooking time, remove shrimp from the marinade and pat excess marinade away with paper towels. Discard the marinade.

3. Cut the bacon crosswise into half-length pieces. Wrap a shrimp with a half strip of bacon; then skewer them, making sure to pierce both ends of the bacon. Continue with remaining shrimp and bacon. You may have bacon left over.

4. Cook over a hot fire until bacon is crisp and shrimp is pink, 2 to 4 minutes per side. Serve with comeback sauce and herbed rice.

Nutrition information per serving: 416 calories, 23 g fat, 6 g saturated fat, 315 mg cholesterol, 3 g carbohydrates, 1 g sugar, 48 g protein, 966 mg sodium, 1 g fiber

Comeback sauce

In a medium bowl, combine ¾ cup each mayonnaise and ketchup, ¼ cup Sriracha or your favorite hot sauce, 2 tablespoons minced green onion, 1 tablespoon each lemon juice and Worcestershire sauce, 1 teaspoon each dry mustard and smoked paprika, 1 tablespoon minced garlic, ½ teaspoon each black pepper and salt. If the sauce is too thick, thin it with a little olive oil.

ABEL URIBE/CHICAGO TRIBUNE; SHANNON KINSELLA/FOOD STYLING

Lamb kebabs go good with a lemon, wine, onion, garlic, Dijon and herb marinade.

Lamb kebabs

Prep: 40 minutes Marinate: 8 hours Grill: 8-10 minutes Makes: 4 servings

This garlicky marinade enhances lamb's richness. Request that the butcher trim away fat and connective tissue if you've asked him or her to cut it into cubes for you. As always, discard marinade after marinating raw meat.

½ cup olive oil

Juice of 1 lemon

2 tablespoons dry red wine

½ small onion, cut into chunks

4 large cloves garlic, smashed, minced

1 tablespoon Dijon mustard

1 ½ teaspoons each: dried oregano, basil, rosemary and cumin

½ teaspoon each: coarse salt and black pepper

1 ½ pounds leg of lamb, cut into 1 ½- to 2-inch cubes

Z'hug, see recipe

1. In a blender or food processor fitted with a steel knife, combine olive oil, lemon juice, wine, onion, garlic, Dijon mustard, dried herbs and salt and pepper. Whiz until the mixture thickens — it will look like mayonnaise when you're done.

2. Pour the marinade into a gallon zip-close plastic bag. Add the lamb, seal the top and knead to make sure marinade touches all the lamb pieces. Refrigerate 8 to 24 hours, turning once or twice.

3. At cooking time, remove the lamb from the marinade and pat excess marinade away with paper towels. Discard remaining marinade. Thread the lamb pieces onto skewers, with 4 or 5 cubes on each.

4. Grill over a hot fire, 4 to 5 minutes per side. Serve with z'hug and couscous, if desired.

Nutrition information per serving: 304 calories, 18 g fat, 5 g saturated fat, 100 mg cholesterol, 2 g carbohydrates, 0 g sugar, 33 g protein, 535 mg sodium, 0 g fiber

Z'hug

Place 1 bunch parsley, 1 bunch cilantro, 4 cloves garlic, 1 teaspoon salt, 2 jalapenos and 2 serrano peppers in the work bowl of a food processor fitted with a steel blade. Whiz until the mixture is a paste, then thin with olive oil to a saucy consistency. Taste and adjust heat by adding cracked red pepper flakes to your preference.

Lime-marinated skirt steak kebabs

Prep: 40 minutes Marinate: 8 hours Grill: 8-10 minutes Makes: 4 servings

Skirt steak is a good choice for these kebabs because of its fattiness, which keeps the meat from drying out. If you can't find it, substitute flank steak, cut in the same way. Threading the strips of steak onto the skewer satay-style means these kebabs will cook very quickly — don't leave them untended on the grill. Zest the limes before squeezing their juice.

1 ½ pounds skirt steak or flank steak

½ cup lime juice from about 8 limes

½ cup olive oil

4 cloves garlic, smashed, peeled

1 tablespoon Dijon-style mustard

½ teaspoon each: salt, black pepper and crushed red pepper flakes

Grated zest from 2 limes

Additional limes, cut into quarters, for garnish

1. Lay the skirt steak across the cutting board so that a long side is nearest to you. Using a sharp knife, cut the steak into ½-inch-thick slices across the width, angling the knife blade about 45 degrees so you make a slanting cut. Place the beef slices into a gallon zip-close plastic bag.

2. In a blender or food processor fitted with a metal blade, combine lime juice, olive oil, garlic, mustard, salt, black pepper, crushed red pepper flakes and zest. Whiz until everything is combined, about 1 minute.

3. Pour the marinade into a zip-close bag with the beef; seal the top. Knead the bag briefly to make sure the marinade contacts all the beef. Refrigerate 8 to 24 hours, turning once or twice.

4. At cooking time, remove the beef from the marinade, discarding marinade. Pat excess marinade from beef slices. Thread the slices satay-style onto skewers.

5. Grill over a hot fire, 2 to 4 minutes per side. Serve with harissa-yogurt sauce and saffron rice, if desired.

Nutrition information per serving: 378 calories, 25 g fat, 7 g saturated fat, 118 mg cholesterol, 1 g carbohydrates, 0 g sugar, 38 g protein, 176 mg sodium, 0 g fiber

Turn your taco inside out

By Ellie Krieger
Special to The Washington Post

I have a soft spot in my heart for hard-shell tacos. It's partly thanks to joyful childhood memories of meals whipped up from those boxed kits, but it's also because they taste lip-smackingly good with their warm, spiced meat; crisp, cool vegetables; and crunchy, fried shells.

These days, taco night at home takes as many forms as there are Tuesdays in a year, from fish with slaw on soft whole-wheat tortillas to sliced steak with charred poblano peppers on fresh corn tortillas.

When I hanker for the crunch of those retro ground-beef tacos, I make them, but I ditch the box and give mine a healthy update by turning them inside out.

I make lettuce leaves the shells to be piled with fillings and use crunchy tortilla chips as one of the toppings.

This essentially flips the ratio of vegetables to fried tortillas from the original, and makes the whole meal lighter and more healthful while keeping all the right textures and flavors in place.

Ellie Krieger is a nutritionist and cookbook author.

½ teaspoon granulated garlic (aka garlic powder)

¼ teaspoon kosher salt

¼ teaspoon onion powder

⅛ teaspoon ground cayenne pepper, plus more as needed

1 tablespoon extra-virgin olive oil

12 ounces lean ground beef (93 percent lean or higher)

1 can (15 ounces) no-salt-added black beans, drained, rinsed

24 large leaves gem lettuce or hearts of romaine (about 3 heads)

2 medium tomatoes, cut into small dice

½ cup shredded sharp cheddar cheese

¼ cup chopped pickled jalapeno peppers (jarred)

1 cup fresh cilantro leaves

1 cup crushed tortilla chips

1. Whisk together the chili powder, cumin, paprika, oregano, garlic, salt, onion powder and cayenne pepper in a small bowl.

2. Heat the oil until shimmering in a large skillet over medium-high heat. Add the ground beef; cook, stirring and breaking it up until no pink remains, 2 to 3 minutes. Add the beans and the chili powder mixture; cook, stirring, 1 minute. Add the water; cook, stirring, until the liquid is mostly absorbed, 1 minute.

3. Place the meat mixture and each of the remaining ingredients in separate serving bowls; put them out on the table so diners can build their own tacos. To assemble, place about 2 tablespoons of the meat mixture into each lettuce leaf. Garnish with tomatoes, cheese, pickled jalapenos, cilantro and some crushed tortilla chips.

DREAMSTIME

Sprinkle hot, just-popped corn with a powder that bursts with the flavor of ranch dressing.

Add a gourmet touch to a favorite movie snack

By Wolfgang Puck
Tribune Content Agency

The actual calendar start of summer is still weeks away. But as far as the movie industry is concerned, the hottest months have already begun. We've entered that time of year when, week after week, we're bombarded with summer blockbusters. Each Friday brings the latest fantastical superheroes, marauding monsters, dazzling 3D animation, beloved children's book adaptations and other big-screen fare that aims to fills the seats of theaters everywhere.

I love to take in the must-see movies as much as anyone, and I often go with my two younger sons, Oliver and Alexander. As a chef, however, I almost always find one part of the experience, the snacks, more than a little disappointing.

That got me thinking: What would I do if I were given control over a movie theater's snack bar? I'd keep a steady stream of individual-serving gourmet pizzas coming from an oven behind the counter. Maybe there would be fresh-baked cookies and chocolate truffles. We'd have gourmet ice cream bars too.

But what about the popcorn? Even if you get a batch that's been freshly popped, it usually comes with a buttery flavor that tastes artificial because it is; the result of products like unhealthy partially hydrogenated soybean oil and chemicals with tongue-twisting names, which together can leave an unpleasant aftertaste.

I'd much rather make my own popcorn, flavoring it with a combination of natural seasonings, as I do in the following recipe for a snack my team and I served at the Governors Ball following the most recent Academy Awards ceremony.

Spicy ranch popcorn is sprinkled with a powder that, on contact with the hot just-popped corn, bursts with the widely popular flavor of ranch dressing. You can make the seasoning powder in just a few seconds while your corn is popping. All you need are easy-to-find ingredients: Parmesan from the cheese or deli section; milk powder or buttermilk powder from the dairy or baking aisle; onion and garlic powders and red pepper flakes from the seasonings; and citric acid powder, usually stocked in the canning section or sometimes found labeled "sour salt" among the kosher foods.

Seal them all in a jar, shake them up to mix, and you're ready to go.

But don't get me wrong: I'm not suggesting that you sneak good homemade popcorn into the movies. After all, while some movie theaters may allow you to take in your own snacks, others won't; so make sure to check ahead.

The good news is that watching movies that you stream on TV, even recent blockbusters, has never been easier or better.

So, at the very least, you can enjoy this popcorn in the comfort of your own home.

Spicy ranch popcorn

Prep: 10 minutes

Cook: 5 minutes

Makes: about 4 cups, serving 1 to 4

Look for citric acid powder in the canning section of the supermarket; it also sometimes is found labeled "sour salt" among the kosher foods.

Popcorn:

2 tablespoons plus 1 teaspoon unpopped popcorn kernels

Spicy ranch powder:

¼ cup evaporated milk powder or buttermilk powder

¼ cup freshly grated Parmesan cheese

1 teaspoon onion powder

½ teaspoon garlic powder

½ teaspoon crushed red pepper flakes

1. For the popcorn, put the oil in a heavy-bottomed 1½- or 2-quart saucepan. Add 3 or 4 kernels popcorn and place the pan over medium-high heat. When these test kernels pop, immediately add the remaining popcorn in a single layer, taking care to keep your hands, face and hair safely clear of the hot oil.

2. Cover the pan, and remove it from the heat for about 30 seconds. Then, return the covered pan to the heat and, as soon as you hear the kernels beginning to pop, gently shake the pan back and forth on the burner.

3. When the popping finally slows to 4 or 5 seconds between pops, remove the pan from the heat, carefully remove the lid to avoid the steam that will rise from the pot, and immediately empty the popcorn into a wide bowl.

4. While the corn is popping, prepare the spicy ranch powder: Put the evaporated milk powder, Parmesan, onion powder, garlic powder, citric acid powder and red pepper flakes into a jar with a tight-fitting lid. Close the lid and shake the jar briefly but vigorously to combine the ingredients. Alternatively, pull all the ingredients in a small mixing bowl and stir them together thoroughly.

5. As soon as the corn has finished popping and you've emptied it into a bowl, sprinkle the seasoning powder evenly over the hot popcorn and use a large spoon to toss it well, evenly coating all the kernels. Serve the popcorn immediately, dividing it among individual bowls or movie theater-style boxes or bags.

How to make cheese puffs

Gougeres are good, quick bites to serve when friends visit

James P. DeWan
Prep School

Today we tackle pate a choux — Gesundheit! — the primordial goo of sweet eclairs, beignets and profiteroles, not to mention the savory gougeres we Anglophones call "cheese puffs."

Why you need to learn this

Pate a choux (pot-ah-SHOO) — and, therefore, its many manifestations — is surprisingly easy, something to have in your back pocket the next time Madge invites herself over.

The steps you take

Coincidentally, the method for pate a choux, is eerily similar to that of a potion I use for conjuring demons. Only, instead of summoning Satan's minions from the hoary pits of hell, we're making gougeres. "Potato, potato," as my fine young son likes to say. Observe:

1. The Boiling: In my demonic potion, I use clarified gnat tears, but for pate a choux, it's butter and milk (or water, or a combination). Bring it to a boil in a saucepan over high heat.

2. The Dumping of the Flour: Upon boiling, the flour goes in all at once. Consider doing this off heat, because puffs of flour can be flammable. It's why people don't smoke around grain silos: One errant spark and — here's one for the "Star Wars" geeks — it's like Alderaan after the Death Star.

3. The Stirring: Place the pan on medium heat, and attack with a wooden spoon. After several minutes, the dough will start to form a smooth ball as it pulls away from the pan's sides. Also, a starchy film will adhere to the bottom of the pan. These signs portend the following step:

4. The Cooling: Remove from heat. From here, you can finish in that pan, containing your mess and making cleanup easier, although there's more tiresome mixing afoot. Conversely, you could finish in a stand mixer, thereby dirtying another bowl, but offering sweet surcease to your aching wrist.

Regardless, rest the dough for several minutes, until the temperature drops to 110 to 140 degrees Fahrenheit, cool enough not to cook the eggs, which are added next.

5. The Adding of the Eggs: Stir in the eggs one at a time, incorporating each completely before adding the next. Before incorporation occurs, it'll look crazy, like something slipping down Grendel's cave wall. Fear not, though, as our eggy chaos will soon cohere into a smooth and lustrous paste. Lifted onto a spoon, it should stretch slowly, then break away, leaving a v-shaped tail.

6. The Baking: The hot oven turns the water in pate a choux to steam, inflating it, then coagulating the egg proteins to hold its shape.

Speaking of shapes, here are several ideas for how to use this mighty product:

Beignets: Drop tablespoons of choux paste gently into a deep fryer.

Cream puffs or gougeres (see recipe): Spoon (or pipe) it onto a parchment-covered baking sheet in tablespoon-size blobs.

Eclairs: Pipe it into 4- to 5-inch long lines. Bake at 375 degrees about 30 minutes, until the outsides are brown and crispy as a Triassic lake bed, with insides as light and airy as a blimp full of angels.

Gougeres can be served directly from the oven. Beignets are dusted with powdered sugar, and eclairs and profiteroles can be cooled, filled with pastry cream, slathered with chocolate ganache, and served with conviction. Gesundheit.

Gougeres (French cheese puffs) are made from pate a choux, a simple pastry dough used for making such treats as beignets and profiteroles.

Gougeres

Prep: 15 minutes Cook: 60 to 70 minutes Makes: 30 to 40 gougeres

You can freeze baked gougeres; just warm them in a hot oven when the mood strikes.

1 cup milk or water (or ½ cup each milk and water)
½ stick (4 tablespoons) butter
¼ teaspoon salt
⅛ teaspoon black pepper
⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper, optional
Pinch of nutmeg
1 cup flour
4 eggs
1 cup grated Gruyere or cheddar cheese
¼ cup grated Parmesan, plus more for topping
6 ounces bacon, diced and crisped, optional
½ teaspoon paprika

1. Bring milk, butter, salt, pepper, cayenne and nutmeg to a rapid boil in a heavy-bottomed saucepan.

2. Remove pan from heat, add flour all at once and mix vigorously with wooden spoon until combined.

3. Return pan to heat; cook over medium, stirring constantly, until a light starchy film forms on pan bottom and mixture pulls away from sides to form a smooth ball, 1 to 2 minutes. Remove from heat; transfer contents to bowl of a stand mixer.

4. Mix with the paddle attachment to cool to 110 to 140 degrees Fahrenheit, 1 to 2 minutes.

5. With mixer running, add one egg; mix until fully incorporated, about 30 seconds. Repeat until all eggs are incorporated.

6. Remove bowl from mixer; stir in Gruyere and ¼ cup Parmesan, optional bacon and paprika until just combined. Transfer mixture to a piping bag fitted with a medium round tip.

7. Pipe 1 tablespoon portions onto a parchment-lined baking sheet. (Alternately, use a tablespoon to portion out the mixture.) Sprinkle tops with grated Parmesan; bake at 375 degrees until crisp and golden brown, about 30 minutes. Serve immediately or at room temperature.

With the mixer running, eggs are added one at a time and mixed in until fully incorporated.

The dough is piped onto a parchment-lined baking sheet in tablespoon-size portions.

An ode to Stappi, the red bitter soda from Italy

By Joe Gray
Chicago Tribune

I don't know if my love affair with Stappi is because of the bitter edge to the sweet soda or because of its vibrant vermillion color and the super-cute little bottles.

Flavor is important in Italian culture, yes, but so is design. Stappi brings together both beautifully.

We're talking about Stappi Red Bitter, one flavor in a line of Italian-made sodas that also includes rabarbaro (rhubarb), chinotto (another bitter flavor), gassosa (lemon), coffee, cedrata (citron), lemon, cola, tonic and orange. I discovered it a few years back at an Italian market, a six-pack sitting unassumingly in the refrigerator case, next to the apricot and pear nectars and sparkling waters. A sucker for Italian products, I carted a six home.

And loved it. The bottle's sloping neck, its diminutive size (holding just 100 milliliters, about 3.4 ounces, or under ½ cup). The bright color. The bitter flavor, a taste we don't expect in a soda, but Italians embrace. Slightly fizzy, and a bit viscous, it's a refreshing nonalcoholic version of the country's aperitivo liqueurs, the most famous of which is Campari.

Though I've read plenty of comparisons to that famed drink, Stappi Red Bitter is not that. It doesn't have the same flavor profile, nor the complexity. But it does fit into the predinner drink niche. The fact that it's alcohol-free gives it versatility. If you don't drink or want to skip booze, it's great on the rocks, or cut with some sparkling water to up the bubbly factor of the just slightly frizzante soda. As a base for a low-proof spritz, it stands in ably for Aperol and its kin. I like it with prosecco, at two to one, Italian sparkler to Stappi.

Made in the small town of Sant'Elena Sannita in the eastern region of Molise, a few hours east of Rome, Stappi sodas claim a long history. The brand dates to the 1980s, but the company, Di Lorio, goes back to 1896 and claims it uses pure mineral water. Those facts are in case you like a little history with your drink. And another tidbit to pull out at cocktail hour: Stappi comes from stappare, which means to uncork. Story goes that the then hand-blown bottles were topped with marbles and removing one created the characteristic sound captured in the name. Sounds apocryphal. But also like a tale that's very Italian, just like the drink.

Spritz

1 bottle (100 milliliters) Stappi Red Bitter
3 ounces sparkling wine
1 ounce sparkling water
1 slice or wedge orange

Pour the ingredients over ice in a wine glass. Stir gently. Garnish with orange slice or wedge. Give a gentle stir. Adjust with more of the sparkler, if you like.

Anheuser-Busch tries pivot to the high road

By Josh Noel
Chicago Tribune

DREW ANGERER/GETTY

Anheuser-Busch says Bud Light is leading the transparency movement for beer. Yet transparency remains an unlikely claim from a company that has been rooted in opacity during its long climb to becoming the nation's dominant beer player.

You've seen Spuds MacKenzie.

You've seen the Clydesdales.

You've seen the Wazzup guys, the frogs and "Dilly Dilly."

Now comes Anheuser-Busch's most audacious advertising campaign to date: transparency.

Yes, good old-fashioned honesty is the latest salvo from the nation's largest beer company in an effort to stop the bleeding for Bud Light, which remains the nation's top-selling brand despite years of declining sales.

The effort began Super Bowl Sunday with the now-infamous shot at chief rival MillerCoors' use of corn syrup in its two leading brands, Miller Lite and Coors Light.

Things escalated quickly, turning to a war of words (and tweets) and eventually a lawsuit filed by MillerCoors, which claimed Anheuser-Busch was engaged in "fearmongering" and "deliberate deception."

Anheuser-Busch, meanwhile, attempted to pivot to the high road by saying its barbs were in fact in the interest of beer drinkers.

"Consumers are demanding more transparency around the food and drink they consume, and Bud Light is leading the transparency movement for beer," Anheuser-Busch InBev vice president of legal and corporate affairs, Cesar Vargas, said in a prepared statement. "We will continue to lead the effort toward increased transparency as it benefits the entire beer industry."

Its proof? A label on Bud Light packaging that listed four ingredients: "Water, Barley, Rice, Hops." (It should be noted that rice is not typically a core beer ingredient; it can be a highly specialized ingredient, but has largely been considered a cost-saving shortcut.)

Weeks later, Anheuser-Busch followed with an ingredient panel on Bud Light Orange, leading Harry Schuhmacher, editor and publisher of Beer Business Daily, to call the claims of transparency — and accompanying ingredient panels — "a long play" for the company. Sure enough, this week, the website My Beer Buzz reported that the Alcohol and Tobacco Tax and Trade Bureau has approved new Bud Light Orange and Bud Light Lime labels that also proclaim "No Corn Syrup."

Yet transparency remains an unlikely claim from a company rooted in opacity during its long climb to becoming the nation's dominant beer player. If anything, the murkiness has only grown as Anheuser-Busch had looked to reverse more than a decade of decline in the U.S. beer market — from just under 50% in 2003 to 41% in 2018, according to Beer Marketer's Insights.

Still, it remains the nation's largest beer company by a comfortable margin after reaching the top of the mountain by any number of methods: spending gobs of money on marketing and sponsorships, advertising (the aforementioned Spuds, frogs and Wazzup guys); demanding maximum loyalty from its distributors (thereby limiting opportunities for competitors); employing tactics that caught the eyes of various regulators; and, yes, trickery and obfuscation.

There have been brands introduced precisely to confuse, such as Pacific Ridge Pale Ale, a virtual clone of Sierra Nevada Pale Ale — from ingredients to packaging to messaging — released during the late 1990s (and which quickly faded away).

It has twice been sued for quietly moving production of two well-known imports — Kirin Ichiban of Japan and Beck's of Germany — to Anheuser-Busch breweries in the United States while continuing to imply they were imported products. Both suits were settled for millions of dollars.

"They realized they had been deceived," said a lawyer for the Beck's plaintiffs. "The packaging didn't really explain that it was a domestic beer."

Though its earlier attempts to lock down the distribution tier raised anti-competitive concerns, Anheuser-Busch has more recently enacted stealthier strategies for gaining an outsize advantage unrecognizable to most consumers.

It has entered the world of beer media with the October website, where Anheuser-Busch beer just so happens to find hearty praise. October has also staged a beer festival that did little to tout Anheuser-Busch's prominent role in the event, even though it poured more than 40 percent of the beer on site.

And now, since its entry into craft beer, there's the festering question of where the beer is made. Anheuser-Busch has routinely scaled up production of the 10 craft breweries it has purchased since 2011, starting with Chicago's Goose Island Beer Co. It makes sense; Anheuser-Busch bought those brands to grow them.

But as I explained in "Barrel-Aged Stout and Selling Out: Goose Island, Anheuser-Busch and How Craft Beer Became Big Business," my book about Anheuser-Busch's push into craft beer, the company has done little to clue customers in about how that growth has unfolded.

Though production of many of its craft brands has been passed off to Anheuser-Busch breweries — its biggest sellers at the moment are Goose Island IPA and Elysian Brewing's Space Dust, also an IPA — the company had had little interest in helping customers to distinguish which beers are actually made by those acquisitions and which are made by Anheuser-Busch.

Craft beer depends on story, people and places far more than mass market beer — no one cares where Bud Light is made — and for that reason, Anheuser-Busch has held tightly to the story, people and places acquired with their craft brands.

Yet cans of Golden Road's Wolf Pup Session IPA, which declare "Los Angeles" on an electric blue background featuring an image of a palm tree, are made at Anheuser-Busch's brewery in Fairfield, Calif., nearly 400 miles north of the actual Golden Road brewery in L.A. Bottles of Blue Point prominently featuring "Est. Long Island" on their front labels were made in Merrimack, N.H. The back label of a Goose Island beer made in upstate New York implied a direct relationship to the Chicago brewery 700 miles away: "Stop by and say hello. Goose Island taproom: at the corner of Fulton and Wood in Chicago." And on it goes. As I wrote in the book:

None of the packaging for any of Anheuser-Busch InBev's craft acquisitions included the words Anheuser-Busch InBev. Not on the bottle. Not on the can. Not on the cardboard twelve pack. Not anywhere. The closest hint came in the tiny horizontal print on the sides of its bottles and cans. As beer from its craft acquisitions was increasingly offloaded to Anheuser-Busch breweries, a pattern emerged: the "home" market — where the acquired brewery was physically located — was listed first, followed by the location of the Anheuser-Busch breweries where the beer was actually made:

Goose Island Beer Co. Chicago, IL, Baldwinsville, NY & Fort Collins, CO

Golden Road Brewing Los Angeles, CA & Fairfield CA

Brewed and bottled by Elysian Brewing Co., Inc. Seattle, WA & Fairfield CA

Blue Point Brewing Company Patchogue, NY and Merrimack, NH

Breckenridge Brewery, LLC Littleton, CO and Fort Collins, CO

So, no. Don't quite believe Anheuser-Busch is suddenly a paragon of transparency. What we've come across is a moment where Anheuser-Busch senses an advantage in an era where consumers are more thoughtful about sourcing and ingredients than they likely have been at any time in recent memory. Corn syrup is a convenient boogeyman. Transparency — or, more accurately, the idea of it — is a marketing strategy no different than Wazzup.

And in fact, we've been here before.

During the mid-1990s, when Anheuser-Busch was first feeling the squeeze from the nascent craft beer industry, among the gravest threats was Samuel Adams Boston Lager, a beer dealing with its own questions of transparency.

Rather than a product of Boston, it was in fact made in Cincinnati. As explained in Chapter 10 of "Barrel-Aged Stout and Selling Out," Anheuser-Busch was all too happy to champion honesty in an episode of "Dateline" presented as an expose of craft beer and practices such as contract brewing:

Anheuser-Busch's vice president of consumer awareness, Francine Katz, told the television program that contract brewing "comes down to honesty and truth in labeling ... All we're saying is, 'Hey guys, let's agree on some basic rules of honesty, let's be truthful on our labels.' " She directed particular ire at Pete's Brewing, whose Wicked Ale was manufactured at Stroh's Brewing in St. Paul, Minnesota.

To be fair, Anheuser-Busch is hardly the only beer company engaged in consumer sleight of hand. Plenty of craft brands exist just as Sam Adams initially did — as brands made under contract by other breweries. Though it has two small breweries in Denver, the notion of Blue Moon Brewing Co. is largely a fiction; Blue Moon Belgian White is made by — and has always been made by — MillerCoors.

And in recent weeks, Craft Brew Alliance agreed to settle a class-action lawsuit over alleged "false and deceptive advertising" over its family of Kona beers. Despite Kona's identity as a Hawaiian brand — and the fact that CBA does operate a production facility in Hawaii — Brewbound reports that a majority of Kona beer sold in the continental U.S. is made at breweries in Portland, Ore., Portsmouth, N.H., and — you may not be shocked to know — an Anheuser-Busch brewery in Fort Collins, Colo. Anheuser-Busch is a minority owner of CBA.

In other words, it's the proverbial business as usual for the company that claims to champion transparency.

Transparency, of course, is something to admire. Yet twice during the past 23 years, Anheuser-Busch has embraced the notion only when convenient. True transparency would make clear which of its brands are made by breweries owned by Anheuser-Busch and which are in fact made by Anheuser-Busch. It would include date codes featuring the date beer was packaged (which the company occasionally embraces though just as often drops). It wouldn't stealthily account for 41% of a beer festival. Its brands wouldn't show up in its media arm's favorite beers of the year without acknowledging common ownership.

Instead we get transparency that looks mostly like marketing. Look no farther than Anheuser-Busch's own roster of beers for the evidence, where dozens of brands are made with corn syrup or, worse, high fructose corn syrup — from the Rita series to portions of its Shock Top line to Natural Light Naturdays, a new strawberry-lemon light lager.

We should all look forward to seeing that information on an ingredient panel.

The lure of shrimp cocktail leads to unexpected versions

By Nick Kindelsperger

NICK KINDELSPERGER/CHICAGO TRIBUNE PHOTOS

The classic jumbo shrimp cocktail at Oyster Bar at Shaw's Crab House uses Mexican brown shrimp from the Pacific Ocean.

Portsmith chars its shrimp slightly before chilling it, which gives each bite a smoky aroma.

Alegrias Seafood serves coctel de camaron in a goblet-sized cup filled to the brim with juicy shrimp.

The fried shrimp at Haire's Gulf Shrimp on the South Side have a delicate crust and a perky marinade.

The Baja coctel 2.0 at Lena Brava, Rick Bayless' West Loop restaurant, is unlike other shrimp cocktail dishes.

Faced with a shrimp cocktail, I am powerless. It doesn't even have to be a good version. I'll still drop whatever I'm doing and attack. This is even though sometimes my brain questions the whole concept. (Do I really want a ketchup-based sauce with some terribly expensive seafood?) But any hesitation is but a split-second pause before I have a shrimp in hand, ready to dunk.

Shrimp cocktail is, to my mind at least, the quintessential appetizer — not the best or most creative — but the one that pops to mind first whenever appetizers are mentioned. This is probably because the shrimp cocktail can be found all over the place, from seafood shacks to fancy steakhouses. It's so common that when I decided to research the dish, I knew I'd end up in neighborhoods all over Chicago.

That said, when most of us think about shrimp cocktail, the version you get at steakhouses comes to mind first. Honestly, it feels like you could almost revoke a steakhouse's license if it doesn't have a shrimp cocktail on the menu. You'll find the dish at Gibson's (1028 N. Rush St.), Chicago Chop House (60 W. Ontario St.), Maple & Ash (8 W. Maple St.) and Gene & Georgetti's (500 N. Franklin St.), and you'll pay mightily for each order ($22.50, $23, $25 and $22, respectively).

Steakhouse traditional

These versions trend toward the defiantly straightforward. You have cold shrimp and bright red cocktail sauce, and maybe a slice of lemon, that's it. Usually the shrimp will be hung around the perimeter of a glass, with cocktail sauce poured in the middle. That's how you'll find it at Chicago Cut Steakhouse (300 N. LaSalle Drive), which serves three massive shrimp ($25) around a chilled silver bowl with cocktail sauce in the middle. It's simple, sure, but the cold shrimp are as plump and satisfying as lobster, and the horseradish-heavy cocktail sauce provides the appropriate kick.

But steakhouses being steakhouses, they've found ways to differentiate themselves. Morton's The Steakhouse (65 E. Wacker Place) has nearly the same setup for its jumbo shrimp cocktail ($26) as Chicago Cut, except it also stuffs some dry ice in the cup, so the dish billows fog for a few seconds as the waiter brings it out. It's a move that, honestly, looks impressive, even if it has absolutely nothing to do with how the dish tastes. Personally, I think they should spend more time working on their overly sweet cocktail sauce.

Before I started, I assumed jumbo shrimp were the biggest option out there, but Prime & Provisions (222 N. LaSalle St.) now serves what it refers to as a colossal shrimp cocktail. For $17 you get exactly one shrimp, which at first sounded like a crime I should report to the police until I realized that the one shrimp weighed a half-pound. "It took us a long time to find shrimp this big," says Prime & Provisions' chef Joseph Rizza. After looking around, he was able to find a fairly regular supply through Supreme Lobster, though he often has to order them in 500-pound shipments.

Prime & Provisions' cocktail sauce also stands for out its outrageously spicy horseradish. The restaurant adds a hefty dab of Atomic Horseradish to the cup of cocktail sauce, which brings a whole new meaning to the phrase sinus clearing. I love this sensation, but can understand if you favor a milder experience.

Seafood restaurants

While steakhouse shrimp cocktails are all about making an impression (bigger is always better there), high-end seafood restaurants offer a far more measured approach. They are also, in my research, better. (These places have mostly dispensed with the traditional presentation, favoring laying the shrimp on a bed of crushed ice, with the cocktail sauce in a small saucer.)

When I asked Bill Nevruz, executive partner at Shaw's Crab House (21 E. Hubbard St.) why the shrimp cocktail served at the Oyster Bar was so good ($5.25 per piece), he said that the success of the dish is 90% about the quality of the shrimp.

"We source Mexican brown shrimp from the Pacific side of the Mexican coast," says Nevruz. "A whole bunch of shrimp can be used for shrimp cocktail, but we think these are the absolute best."

Nevruz notes that most shrimp are chemically treated, but that Shaw's gets it shrimp from a co-op called Pacific Shrimp, which refuses to use any chemicals. He believes this results in plumper, more delicious shrimp. If I had to pick the best traditional version of the shrimp cocktail right now in Chicago, it'd be here.

But a number of seafood restaurants are starting to push at the edges of the dish. At Giuseppe Tentori's GT Fish & Oyster (531 N. Wells St.) in River North, the absurdly juicy shrimp ($8 each) arrive lightly tossed with herbs, which I realize doesn't sound like a huge deal, except that no other place downtown tosses their shrimp with anything. Portsmith (660 N. State St.) takes it a step further with its version ($16), charring the shrimp slightly before chilling it, which gives each bite an intoxicating smoky aroma.

Mexican coctel

For most people, this style of the shrimp cocktail, where cold shrimp are served with a cocktail sauce, is the only version worth considering. But this is really just the beginning. As I mentioned in my history of the dish, Mexican coctel de camaron (shrimp cocktail) and coctel de mariscos (seafood cocktail) actually have far more in common with the original oyster cocktail, which predated the shrimp cocktail by about 50 years, than anything you'd find in a steakhouse.

Forget any notions of a dainty appetizer; these are feasts. Order the coctel de camaron ($12.99) at Alegrias Seafood (1024 N. Ashland Ave.), and you'll get a large goblet filled to the brim with juicy shrimp swimming in a liquid of tomatoes with crunchy chopped cucumber and onion, which is crowned by half of a sliced avocado. You also get approximately a dozen fried corn tostadas, a stack of saltines, lime wedges, a habanero-laced salsa and four different hot sauces. That's essentially the same setup you'll get at Mariscos de Kora (5207 S. Archer Ave.), except that you get two fresh salsas.

Eating one of these is an active event, in which you can start with either a cracker or a piece of tostada, and then add as much shrimp and salsa as you see fit. This shouldn't come as any surprise to those who know me, but if I had to choose my favorite variation of the shrimp cocktail, this would definitely be it.

Defying categories?

Move past the coctel de camaron, and we are left with lots of dishes around Chicago that could be included or excluded depending on how strict your definition of shrimp cocktail is. If it's as simple as shrimp served with cocktail sauce, then you can find the dish in nearly every neighborhood. At Hagen's Fish Market (5635 W. Montrose Ave.) you can order boiled shrimp ($23.99 a pound) and a cup of cocktail sauce, and you'd have a totally solid version. But Hagen's also serves smoked shrimp ($17.49 a pound), which I think taste even better with the horseradish-heavy sauce. Does that count?

Fried versions

What about fried shrimp? Chicago has dozens of old-school fried shrimp shacks and many still dish out little plastic cups of cocktail sauce. That's what you'll find at the Fish Keg (2233 Howard St.) on the Far North Side, where the shrimp have an extra crunchy coating ($18.99 a pound), and at Haire's Gulf Shrimp (7448 S. Vincennes Ave.) on the South Side, where the shrimp ($11.76 for a small order) have a shockingly delicate crust and a perky marinade, which pairs nicely with a mild cocktail sauce.

But what about the jumbo shrimp platter ($16.99) at Fisherman's Island (432 E. 87th St.) in Chatham? This seafood spot serves shrimp bathed in butter and coated in a house seasoning, and comes in a container heaping with potatoes, corn and broccoli. Surely, no one would call this shrimp cocktail, yet it does come with cocktail sauce.

My usual line of thinking is that imposing my own arbitrary definition on a dish is mostly worthless. If a restaurant describes something as a specific dish, who's to say it's not? Since Fisherman's Island doesn't call what it serves a shrimp cocktail, you can safely say it's not (even though it was tasty).

Coctel 2.0

Which brings us to Lena Brava (900 W. Randolph St.).

At Rick Bayless' West Loop restaurant you'll find Baja coctel 2.0 ($17) on the menu. Order it, and you'll receive something that doesn't look like any version of the dish I've ever encountered. This one features grilled sepia (a type of cuttlefish that tastes sort of like squid) and lime-cured Florida pink shrimp on a plate with a smear of a dark red salsa macha, a toasted ancho chile salsa spiked with Ancho Reyes liqueur.

According to culinary director Andres Padilla, the restaurant had a slightly more traditional coctel on the menu before (hence the 2.0). "But on a recent staff trip to Puebla, one of the cooks became obsessed with Ancho Reyes liqueur, a spicy concoction," says Padilla. "What really shines is his version of salsa macha. It has a nice kick of heat, with a little toasted ancho chile and a punch of arbol chiles. You have an expectation of what a shrimp coctel is, but once you taste this, it's not what you expected. It's so fun and playful."

He's certainly right about that. I loved the interplay of the different textures, and the brightness of the acidity matched with the ringing chile heat. I finished the whole thing within a minute or two, and would have licked the plate clean had there not been people sitting nearby to judge me.

Was it a real shrimp cocktail? Considering that the shrimp cocktail is a variation of the oyster cocktail, which was originally served as a drink, I wouldn't fuss over the strict definition of what you think a shrimp cocktail has to be. All that matters to me is the irresistible draw of the dish, the pull that lures me in no matter what I'm doing, and this one certainly has that.

Cocktail

more than a seaside treat, as Waverley Root explains in "Food": "Shrimp are highly perishable; they die quickly after being taken from the water and decay quickly after dying. In consequence there was formerly no commercial shrimp fishing, for the catch could not be delivered in edible condition more than a few miles from the place where it was taken."

Oysters, on the other hand, were plentiful at restaurants almost all over the country in the 19th century. John Mariani in "The Dictionary of American Food and Drink" claims that Americans at the time were "oyster mad." So many bivalves were shipped on stagecoaches between Baltimore and Ohio that the route was dubbed the Oyster Line. According to "The Oxford Companion to Food" by Alan Davidson, the 19th century was "the period of supreme happiness" for "American oyster-lovers." Oysters reached peak popularity in 1895, when 170 million pounds of them were harvested in America. That number has steadily decreased since then.

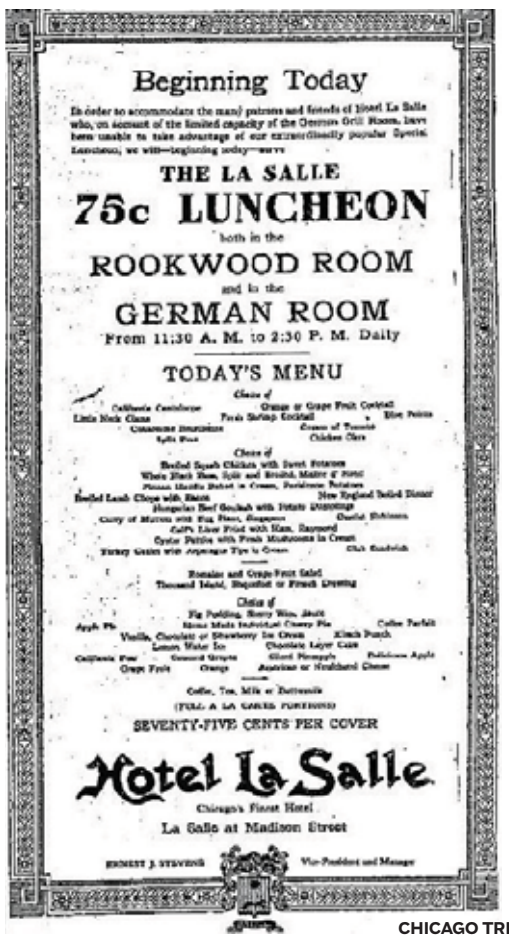
This means that if you want to understand the history of the shrimp cocktail, you first need to deal with the oyster cocktail. Mariani, once again in "The Dictionary of American Food and Drink," seems confidant that the oyster cocktail was created in "1860 by a San Francisco miner who dipped his oyster in ketchup." However, he doesn't supply the name of the miner, or where he got the information. I couldn't help but wonder if this was just an apocryphal tale, which had been passed down and repeated in endless newspaper articles over the years.

Plus, it's not until the early 20th century that the oyster cocktail starts regularly popping up in cookbooks. There's no mention of the dish in the original 1896 edition of "The Boston Cooking-School Cook Book" by Fannie Merritt Farmer. But by the third edition in 1918, the cookbook had not one but three recipes for oyster cocktail. It's the recipe for "oyster cocktail III" that looks most familiar to us today, as it calls for a combination of "tomato catsup," lemon juice, chopped shallot, Tabasco sauce, salt and grated horseradish root.

While the Merriam-Webster dictionary doesn't have an entry for oyster cocktail or shrimp cocktail, it does have one for cocktail sauce, which it says was first used in print around 1902. This checks out with the Chicago Tribune's archives, where a Feb. 9, 1902, advertisement touts "Snider's cocktail sauce pints" (available for only 23 cents, by the way).

As for its name, the late 19th and early 20th century happen to coincide with the era when people loved to affix the word cocktail to all sorts of objects. That's when women started wearing cocktail dresses to go to cocktail parties, where they listened to cocktail pianists and set their cocktail glasses on cocktail tables. Considering all of this, the obvious logical leap is that cocktail sauce, and thus the oyster cocktail and shrimp cocktail, got its name because it was served at one of these events. (Or, perhaps, at a cocktail lounge.)

But as I kept digging in the Tribune's archives, I came across an article that disproved this assumption. On Thursday, July 4, 1889, the Chicago Daily Tribune (as the paper was known then) reprinted an article from the New York Sun titled "Gastronomical Tips from California." The text mostly focuses on the ramblings of a San Franciscan man at Delmonico's, a popular restaurant just a few blocks from Wall Street. (That establishment, which first opened in 1837, is still in business today.) What's strange, besides the fact that journalists used to print the unverified opinions of people at fancy restaurants, is how the man describes the oyster cocktail not as a dish, but as a drink: "Yes, a dash of absinthe is good in a cocktail, but there is a cocktail we get in San Francisco that knocks out any of your cocktails here. It's the oyster cocktail."



CHICAGO TRIBUNE

A Chicago Tribune advertisement in 1914 detailed the menu at The La Salle, which included "fresh shrimp cocktail," perhaps the first print mention of the dish.

The unnamed man then goes on to detail how to construct the concoction: "Put half a dozen to a dozen small oysters into a goblet or beer glass, with enough of the liquor to cover them. Salt, pepper, catsup, a dash of Tobasco sauce, half a spoonful of Worcestershire, two or three spoonfuls of vinegar, and sometimes a pinch of horseradish. Stir it up with a spoon and drink it down. ... The oyster cocktail is as much of an institution in San Francisco as the whisky cocktail is here."

This story is backed up by noted cocktail historian David Wondrich. "It was touted as a morning bracer and consumed as a cocktail," wrote Wondrich in an email about the oyster cocktail. "You usually found it in bars, but some fishmongers also served it and even, in San Francisco, anyway, some street peddlers, who sold it at 10 cents a glass." He notes that the drink dates back to San Francisco in the 1860s (score one point for Mariani), before slowly moving across the country. "It finally reaches New York in 1889, whereupon, New York being New York, it is promptly claimed as a local invention, attributed to the Manhattan Club."

As for the oyster cocktail's decline, Wondrich has a theory: "You hear of (the oyster cocktail) served pretty frequently through the 1930s, then less and less, and it seems to have petered out in the 1950s, as pollution took its toll of oyster beds and oyster prices shot up."

The reduction in oysters also coincided with the time when the modern shrimp industry kicked into high gear. The first mention of shrimp cocktail I could dig up was in an advertisement in the Chicago Daily Tribune on Nov. 30, 1914, for the daily menu at The La Salle inside the (sadly now demolished) La Salle Hotel. Along with Hungarian beef goulash and turkey cutlets with asparagus tips, you'll find "fresh shrimp cocktail."

Of course, the thing about this variation is that you can't chug cooked shrimp like you can raw oysters, which explains why something that started as a drink morphed into the dish we know today. Since it doesn't need to be consumed in one go, chefs also began to present the sauce and the seafood separately.

These days, the original oyster cocktail has far more in common with the Mexican seafood cocktail (coctel de mariscos) than any shrimp cocktail you'll find in a steakhouse. (As in English, the Spanish word "coctel" means both a mixed alcoholic drink and a seafood dish.) Coctel de mariscos is almost always served as a tall glass with the seafood mixed with a sauce that often includes tomatoes, lime juice, Worcestershire sauce and, of course, a little ketchup.

Considering the word "cocktail" originated in English (Wondrich believes its definition as a drink began in late 18th-century England), it makes sense that the oyster cocktail originated first with English speakers in the United States, before making its way south to Mexico. Of course, fresh seafood and tomatoes have been plentiful in Mexico for eons, so who's to say the dish didn't start there even if it went by a different name?

I tried in vain to figure out when the Mexican coctel de mariscos first appeared. I reached out to Rick Bayless, chef and co-owner of Mexican restaurants Frontera Grill and Topolobampo among others, who thought my hunch that it was inspired by the American dish sounded correct, but added that he "can't back that up." Bayless did, however, invite me to look through his massive collection of Mexican cookbooks housed in a room above Frontera and Topolobampo. After three hours of leafing through hundreds of Mexican cookbooks written in both Spanish and English, I came away just as confused.

I couldn't find any mention of the dish in "El Cocinero Mexicano," a cookbook that dates to 1831. Ricardo Muñoz Zurita's exhaustive "Larousse Diccionario Enciclopedico de la Gastronomia Mexicana," published in 2013, does have an entry for coctel de mariscos, but no mention of when it was invented. In "Yucatan" from 2014, author David Sterling writes that some people claim that the "seafood cocktail was invented in Campeche," but he's unsure if that's "true or not," nor does he give any date.

One of the earliest mentions that I could find was in a book called "Elena's Secrets of Mexican Cooking" by Elena Zelayeta in 1958, which has a recipe for coctel de abulon, or abalone cocktail. Maria A. de Carbia's "Mexico Through My Kitchen Window," published in 1961, features a recipe for avocado cocktail, which features no seafood, but does include ketchup and Worcestershire sauce.

Regardless of its origins, coctel de mariscos is a dish that you eat (hopefully with a stack of saltines), not drink. And any steakhouse waiter would look at you in horror if you tried to slurp a shrimp cocktail. Yet, despite a good hundred years of life outside the beverage category, the majority of shrimp cocktails and coctele de mariscos are still served in cups, when a bowl or a plate with a saucer for the cocktail sauce would do just fine. While most restaurants probably have no idea why they even serve shrimp cocktail this way, hints of the dish's little-known history continue to hide in plain sight.
