

President assails critics as ‘racist’

Pritzker, Lightfoot rail against Trump on tweets on Baltimore

BY GREGORY PRATT AND DAN PETRELLA

Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot on Monday urged Democrats not to get distracted by Donald Trump’s incendiary tweets attacking U.S. Rep. Elijah Cummings and the city of Baltimore.

“Racism is a part of who he is. It is a part of his strategy,” Lightfoot said after an event at the Dunbar high school on the South Side to commemorate the 1919 “Red Summer” race riots in Chicago that left 38 people dead.

“Having this constant conversation about ‘oh, my gosh, is this remark racist?’ Yes of course. That’s part of the strategy,” Lightfoot said. “But let’s focus on what people actually care about and what they need. What they need is leadership.”

At a separate event Monday morning, Democratic Gov. J.B. Pritzker said Trump’s weekend Twitter tirades appear to be pointed at “people of color who are in positions of power or have the ability to effect change.”

“The words that get used, that

WASHINGTON — Facing growing accusations of racism for his incendiary tweets, President Donald Trump lashed out at his critics Monday and sought to deflect the criticism by labeling a leading black congressman as himself racist.

In the latest rhetorical shot at lawmakers of color, Trump said his weekend comments referring to Rep. Elijah Cummings’ majority-black Baltimore district as a “disgusting, rat and rodent infested mess” where “no human being would want to live” were not racist. Instead, Trump argued, “if racist Elijah Cummings would focus more of his energy on helping the good people of his district, and Baltimore itself, perhaps progress could be made in fixing the mess.”

“His radical ‘oversight’ is a joke!” Trump tweeted Sunday.

Their aim: Reclaim the corner

Mothers Against Senseless Killings regroup at intersection in Englewood where two women were gunned down Friday

BY ALICE YIN

The usually bustling corner of Stewart Avenue and 75th Street seems emptier now without Chantell Grant and Andrea Stoudemire.

The two mothers were familiar faces at the Englewood intersection, where the group Mothers Against Senseless Killings has camped out every day during the summer since 2015 — hoping to break the cycle of violence in the neighborhood by transforming a corner with a history of bloodshed into a lively hangout for mothers and their children.

Just before 10 p.m. Friday, Grant and Stoudemire were standing at the corner when a blue SUV passed by and someone opened fire, according to Chicago police. Both women were shot several times in the chest and died at University of Chicago Medical Center. A man was hit in the arm and was stabilized at St. Bernard Hospital.

Police had no motive and have made no arrests.

MASK founder Tamar Manasseh called the shooting “one of the saddest nights of my life.”

“For mothers to be killed in a place where mothers go to seek safety and sisterhood, I take that as a personal threat,” Manasseh, 41, said at a Sunday news conference calling for justice. “Because when you come for one of us, you better believe they came for all of us.”

Manasseh said she held the news conference next to the spot where Grant and Stoudemire were killed to reclaim the corner. On the southeast lot, more than 50 people milled around, chatting and watching their children run around on the grass before Manasseh and other MASK activists began speaking.

A group of mothers handed out cups of pineapple and grapes along with ice-cold juice boxes.

Northerly Island site hurt $13M production

GETTY

REX W. HUPPKE

I’ve been told I should start meditating.
At first, I took that as a personal affront and calmly responded: “AM I NOT ZEN ENOUGH FOR YOU?!, GOOD LORD, HOW (EXPLETIVE) CALM DO I HAVE TO BE, FOR (EXPLETIVE)’S SAKE?!!?”
I then realized I might need to start meditating.
After all, people who meditate say it’s a wonderfully therapeutic practice, one that focuses the mind and calms the nerves. And it stands to reason that people who meditate should know what they’re talking about, what with all the mind-focusing meditation they do.
I also see a number of advertisements for meditation apps on my phone, and advertisements for apps have never steered me wrong. In fact, they helped hone my empathy for the avian plight of angry birds everywhere.
So after reading approximately 12,450 reviews of meditation apps, getting angry because every reviewer was telling me something different and bitterly questioning where these people get the time to write all their stupid reviews, I put my phone down and cried for three days.
Then I realized, again, that I might need to start meditating.
So I downloaded one of the guided meditation apps and gave it a try. What follows is a transcript of the app talking to me and my Zen-depleted brain responding.
Meditation app: Find a comfortable place to sit.
My brain: Like the couch?

Meditation app: Or you can even stretch out on the floor or your bed.
My brain: Which is better?
Meditation app: Now you should gently close your eyes.
My brain: Hold up! Still not clear on the sitting or lying down part.
Meditation app: Let your eyelids softly close.
My brain: HANG ON, DAMMIT! I guess I’ll just sit, whatever.
Meditation app: Now focus on your breathing.
My brain: Why? What’s wrong with it?
Meditation app: Feel your breath coming in ...
My brain: OK.
Meditation app: ... and out. Just let yourself breathe.
My brain: Should I be breathing faster?
Meditation app: In ... and out.
My brain: I’m definitely doing this wrong. What the hell?
Meditation app: Focus on your breathing.
My brain: Why is my breathing so weird?
Meditation app: Feel your stomach rise ...
My brain: I can’t get a full breath.
Meditation app: ... and fall.
My brain: Why am I so sweaty?
Meditation app: Feel your body’s natural rhythm.
My brain: OH GOD, THERE’S SOMETHING WRONG WITH ME!!
Meditation app: Now let’s do something called a full body scan.
My brain: Is that like an MRI?
Meditation app: This is a way to get you to focus your mind on each part of your body.
My brain: I wonder if I need an MRI?
Meditation app: Let’s start with the top of your head.
My brain: MRIs are scary. God, I hope I don’t need one. I need to set a reminder to call the doctor.

Meditation app: Notice how the top of your head feels.
My brain: It feels like something’s probably wrong.
Meditation app: Just be in the moment.
My brain: Easy for you to say; You don’t have something seriously wrong with the top of your head.
Meditation app: Now move your focus down to your neck and shoulders. Do the muscles feel tight?
My brain: Well they do now.
Meditation app: Think about letting your muscles relax. Let the stress leave your body with each breath out.
My brain: Like in “The Exorcist”?
Meditation app: In ... and out.
My brain: There’s a funny tweet somewhere in all this. I gotta send a tweet about trying to meditate.
Meditation app: Now focus on your chest.
My brain: What? Oh, oops. Guess I shouldn’t be thinking about Twitter.
Meditation app: Feel your chest rise with each breath ... then fall.
My brain: Chest. Chest. Chest. Chest. Twitter. DAMMIT!!!
Meditation app: Now move down to your belly.
My brain: I gotta lose weight.

That went on for about 10 minutes, then the app told me I should feel more calm and go out and enjoy the day with a new sense of focus.
I deleted the app and concluded I stink at relaxing. And I set that sense of failure aside with a reminder to stress about it later. Then I sent out a funny tweet about meditating. Which I suppose wasn’t really the point of the whole exercise.
Man, I’m a mess.
I really need to start meditating.

Divided if we do; divided if we don't. Should we keep engaging over Trump's tweets?

HEIDI STEVENS

Balancing Act

There's a passage in Ta-Nehisi Coates' 2017 book, "We Were Eight Years in Power: An American Tragedy" that sprang to mind when I read President Donald Trump's tweets attacking Baltimore and Rep. Elijah Cummings, the 13-term congressman whose district includes the Maryland seaport city.

Coates grew up in Baltimore. "We Were Eight Years in Power" is a collection of his new and previously published essays that look at the Obama years — what they heralded; what, in hindsight, they didn't. The title, in addition to referencing President Barack Obama's two terms, is a quote from Thomas E. Miller, one of six black delegates at the 1895 South Carolina Constitutional Convention, decrying Reconstruction-era policies.

One of the essays in Coates' book is "American Girl," a profile of Michelle Obama that first ran in The Atlantic in 2009. Coates writes about the newly inaugurated first lady connecting with Americans and sharing her vision for the nation partly through stories about her Chicago childhood, shaped as it was by devoted parents, a safe, tight-knit community of neighbors, a cost-of-living that allowed her mom to stay home. "Old neighborhood nostalgia and pride, woven into the larger American quilt," Coates writes.

Some white Americans had never heard a black American recount a life story like Michelle Obama's, Coates writes. "People have never met a Michelle Obama," the first lady told Coates in an interview. "But what they'll come to learn is that there are thousands and thousands of Michelle and Barack Obamas across America. You just don't live next door to them, or there isn't a TV show about them."

I can't do the entire essay (or

KENNETH K. LAM/BALTIMORE SUN

Rep. Elijah Cummings is the 13-term congressman of Maryland's 7th congressional district, which includes Baltimore, most recently described by President Donald Trump as a place "no human being would want to live."

book) justice here.

But the passage that sprang to mind when I read Trump's tweets about Baltimore — a "very dangerous & filthy place," a "rat and rodent infested mess" where "no human being would want to live" — considered the possibility of black Americans' stories being understood, by a growing number of Americans, as legitimate and critical to America's story.

"If you see black identity as you see southern identity, or Irish identity, or Italian identity — not as a separate trunk, but as a branch of the American tree, with roots in the broader experience — then you understand that the particulars of black culture are inseparable from the particulars of the country," Coates writes in that Michelle Obama essay.

With every one of Trump's divisive tweetstorms — Saturday they targeted Baltimore, two weeks ago they targeted four congresswomen, Monday they targeted the Rev. Al Sharpton — I fear we move farther and farther away from the notion of one American tree, with branches and roots that originate from and reach toward different places, but whose strength lies in that single, shared trunk.

Are the tweets a tactic? Sure. Are they meant to distract us from the detention camps at the southwestern border; investigations into the work-related text and emails sent on personal accounts by White House officials; the campaign platforms of the candidates running to unseat Trump; the fact that the Arctic is literally on fire? Probably.

"It's not hard to see what's going on here," the Baltimore Sun wrote in an editorial condemning the Baltimore tweets. "The congressman has been a thorn in this president's side, and Mr. Trump sees attacking African American members of Congress as good politics, as it both warms the cockles of the white supremacists who love him and causes so many of the thoughtful people who don't to scream."

Should those of us who don't subscribe to the president's divide-and-conquer approach — who would prefer to see our fellow Americans united and lifted, rather than divided or conquered, who believe we have a better shot at healing what ails us if we understand that it ails all of us — still spend our time discussing and decrying his rhetoric? I think we should. I worry about the long-term damage if we don't.

I worry we'll continue to look at the shootings in Chicago this weekend and the mass shooting at the Gilroy Garlic Festival on Sunday as wholly unrelated — separate communities, separate problems — rather than symptoms of the same public health crisis.

I worry we'll continue to be coaxed into considering a person's skin color, a person's spiritual beliefs, a person's ZIP code before we determine how much dignity and humanity and opportunity that person deserves. In any tragedy. On any topic — from immigration to poverty to violence to climate change.

I can see how that divisiveness serves a president who wants his constituents to live in fear of each other.

I can't see how it serves the constituents who need the full weight and breadth of each other's ideas and ingenuity and empathy and experiences and sense of urgency if we're going to live up to America's promise as a land of freedom and justice for all.

One tree. Deep roots. Many branches. Strongest as a whole.

Crystal Lake wants Freund family home razed

House where 5-year-old 'AJ' allegedly beaten to death is unoccupied

By Clifford Ward

The city of Crystal Lake is seeking to tear down the ramshackle house where authorities say a 5-year-old boy was beaten to death, allegedly by his parents.

The city filed a court complaint earlier this month, asking approval to raze the unoccupied house at 94 Dole Ave. once occupied by Andrew "AJ" Freund and his family.

AJ's parents, Andrew Freund and Joann Cunningham, are being held in the McHenry County Jail, and have been charged with first-degree murder in the death of their son in April. Information gathered about the home during the police investigation of the boy's death eventually led to the process that resulted in the July 10 city complaint.

"The process began with the city obtaining an administrative search warrant," said David Pardys, special counsel to the city.

JOE SHUMAN/FOR THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Old violation notices are posted on the Crystal Lake home where, authorities say, Andrew Freund and Joanne Cunningham killed their son.

"And that was based on what police officers saw during their investigation of the incident."

The city's follow-up inspections indicated the house needs more than $100,000 in repairs and renovations, and it would be more economical to tear down the structure than to bring it up to code.

The complaint noted 41 violations of city codes, ranging from simple issues such as peeling paint, to health hazards, such as mold and evidence of rodent infestation. An inspector went through the home in late May, the complaint said, and declared it uninhabitable.

"(The property) is unfit for human occupancy and dangerous and unsafe because the condition of the subject property is damaged, decayed, dilapidated or in poor repair, such that subject property is unsafe to the life, health, property or safety of the public and/or occupants of the structure," the complaint said.

Freund and Cunningham were served with copies of the violation notice at the McHenry County Jail on June 24, according to the complaint.

They have been held since shortly after their son was found buried in a shallow grave in Woodstock in late April, six days after the couple reported him missing. Authorities allege the boy was beaten to death in his home before his body was removed and buried. The couple are facing dozens of felony counts along with murder in connection with the death, and they could be sentenced to life in prison.

The Freunds were given 15 days to bring the property up to code or demolish the house themselves. When that period passed, the city was able to move ahead with the process.

Eventually there will be a hearing where the city will call witnesses such as the inspector or the mold specialist who tested the home's interior, Pardys said.

The property's fate will not be determined directly by the city, Pardys said. It will be up to the owner, whoever that may be. The house is under foreclosure, and the city identified several lien holders on the property who can choose to respond to the demolition complaint and become involved in the process, he said.

Janelle Butler, who lives across the street, said the house has been in disrepair for a long time predating AJ's death.

"It absolutely needs to be torn down, and it needed to be even before all of this happened," she said Monday.

Although some people have suggested the property be turned into a memorial park, Butler said she and other neighbors think the property, which is on a busy street, is not suited for a park.

"Maybe the best thing would be for a new house to built and there can be a fresh start, and some other family can be happy there," Butler said. "And life will go on."

Teen's death at 2018 Lollapalooza still baffles family

Mundelein boy was felled by overdose

By Rick Kambic

Melissa Kitzmiller has been staying away from the radio lately.

For the Mundelein mom, hearing commercials for Lollapalooza, the four-day music festival that returns to Chicago this week, remains too traumatic. Her son, Evan, died from a drug overdose during last year's festival in Grant Park.

"It's your worst nightmare as a parent," she said. "He kinda had it all. He had a lot of friends. He worked a job. He was on the honor roll at school. He had a lot going for him."

Evan Kitzmiller, 16, was found unresponsive Aug. 5, 2018, at the festival and was taken to Northwestern Memorial Hospital, where he later was pronounced dead. He and a group of friends had taken trains from north suburban Mundelein to attend all four days of Lollapalooza.

While the reasons for how Evan Kitzmiller died weren't immediately known, officials at the Cook County medical examiner's office eventually determined that toxic levels of MDMA, commonly known as ecstasy, and a byproduct of ecstasy, MDA, nicknamed "Sally," caused his death, the office revealed recently.

In an interview this month with Pioneer Press, Melissa and Andrew Kitzmiller said they routinely talked to their son about the potential dangers of drugs and alcohol, and say they were in constant contact with him throughout each day of Lollapalooza last year and each night when he returned home.

"As far as we know, this was the one and only time he might have tried drugs," said Andrew Kitzmiller. "He was with friends. We knew where he was, who he was with and he checked in with us as he was told."

When asked why Evan might have tried ecstasy, Andrew Kitzmiller said, "because that's what kids do. They make bad decisions all the time."

He said teenagers' mistakes, though, usually result in a ticket from police, a detention at school or being grounded by their parents.

"Even in this circumstance, had he not died, would we have been angry had we found out that he took ecstasy? Yes," Andrew Kitzmiller said, before pausing. "But it's not like it would have been the end of the world. I didn't even know you could die from ecstasy. It seems like such a fluke."

Some 160 concertgoers were taken to local hospitals during Lollapalooza last year, according to Chicago officials. The numbers reflected fewer medical emergencies than past Lollapalooza festivals.

Data published by the Illinois Hospital Association also shows that underage drinking is a leading cause for emergency room visits in Chicago during the days of Lollapalooza.

A public relations firm hired by Lollapalooza organizers to handle media inquiries also did not respond to requests for comment.

Aaron Weiner, director of addiction services at Linden Oaks Behavioral Health in Naperville, said fatal overdoses of ecstasy are relatively rare.

Statistically, Weiner said overdose deaths from all forms of stimulants lag far behind alcohol and narcotics-related overdose deaths, but ecstasy, in particular, ranks low within its own classification.

"This is not something that happens a lot," Weiner said. "A big question in my mind is, 'Did he know he was taking this drug?'"

Weiner said putting drugs into food and beverages has become trendy — and is dangerous.

He said people who aren't professional chemists could unknowingly put too much in, which would be dangerous even to those who intend to get high but especially to those who don't know the food is spiked.

ROB DICKER/PIONEER PRESS

Andrew Kitzmiller, of Mundelein, looks at a portrait of his late son, Evan, who died in 2018 at age 16 from an overdose while at Lollapalooza.

For those who knowingly take a drug, Weiner said, the effects of ecstasy are not immediate and can lead to confusion or impatience and result in someone consuming more.

Because ecstasy is a stimulant, Weiner said, there's a risk of overheating a given body organ or system from continuing to be active when your body would normally slow itself down and cool off.

Weiner said the human body typically cools itself by simultaneously distributing water and reducing activity.

He said that if the brain's call for reduced activity is being overridden by ecstasy, the continued need to cool off could result in drinking too much water.

Locally, Mundelein Police Chief Eric Guenther said his officers occasionally come across incidents involving ecstasy, but it's not as prevalent in the suburbs as other drugs. He agreed that drug infusions, such as edibles, are a growing problem.

"We see a lot of overdoses that involve people not knowing what they're taking, whether it's the quantity of drug being infused or it's a food product also laced with other drugs," Guenther said.

However Evan came upon the drug, his parents have been left to pick up the pieces.

mantel in their family room a year after his death, but many of his possessions have been given to his friends or put in storage for safekeeping.

"We talk about him often," Melissa Kitzmiller said. "We're not trying to pretend that he didn't exist. But some days are harder than others."

Evan's pride and joy was his Honda Civic, according to Andrew Kitzmiller.

Much like with his tickets to Lollapalooza, his parents said they made Evan work a job and earn money to contribute toward a car.

"We didn't agree with his decision to tint the windows," Andrew Kitzmiller said, chuckling through tears. "He bragged about that car to all of his friends."

The Kitzmillers said they kept the car for six months before eventually selling it.

Melissa Kitzmiller's former employer, 1-800-Flowers, also donated money to have a tree planted in Evan's honor at Memorial Park in Mundelein, where he often played basketball.

"It's so amazing. I love everything about that tree," Melissa Kitzmiller said. "It gives his friends a place to go."

Local restaurants sent the family meals in the weeks after Evan died, while friends and neighbors — both past and present — routinely visited throughout the year to help out, the Kitzmillers said.

"We've had a ton of support. People we wouldn't have expected," Melissa Kitzmiller said.

But the family had its share of critics.

Andrew Kitzmiller said judgmental people used social media to question their decision to let Evan travel to Chicago without parental supervision. Others found the Kitzmillers' phone number and called to accuse them of being bad parents.

"My phone exploded with people telling me what a horrible parent I was and how I deserved Evan to die," Melissa Kitzmiller recalled. "It was horrible."

The Kitzmillers have another son, and they already discouraged him from traveling with older cousins to a few Chicago museums earlier this summer.

"It's been a real struggle to not bubble-wrap child number two," Melissa Kitzmiller said.

Andrew Kitzmiller said the anxiety likely will heighten when their second son receives his driver's license.

"We're never going to be OK with what happened. No one would," Andrew Kitzmiller said. "But it's going to take time. There's no magic potion, and, I guess, there's no one-size-fits-all approach to healing."

Lipinski in attendance at scene of California festival shooting

Western Springs congressman and wife not among the injured

By Lisa Donovan

U.S. Rep. Dan Lipinski and his wife were at the Gilroy Garlic Festival in California on Sunday and "heard the loud 'pops'" as a deadly shooting unfolded, his congressional office confirmed Monday.

Neither Lipinski nor his wife, Judy, was injured. Two children and an adult were killed before the 19-year-old gunman was fatally shot by police.

"My wife Judy and I were at the Gilroy Garlic Festival during the shooting," the Democrat from Western Springs is quoted as saying in an emailed statement. "The shooter was not far from us as we heard the loud 'pops,' which seemed to get closer as we ran."

"Judy and I are okay. Thank

Lipinski

God. We pray for those killed and injured, and for their families," Lipinski said.

Authorities on Monday afternoon were still trying to figure out why 19-year-old Santino William Legan opened fire on the crowd at a popular food festival less than a mile from his parents' home. But officials said they believe many more people would have died if officers patrolling the event had not stopped the gunman so quickly.

Police responded in less than a minute, and Legan turned his "AK-47-type" gun on the officers, officials said. Three officers fired back and killed Legan, who legally bought the weapon in Nevada this month.

Markham, church settle long-running legal dispute

City to pay $225,000 in damages, costs

By Mike Nolan

Markham and a small church have settled a legal dispute spanning more than six years, with the city paying damages and legal costs and the church agreeing to build a parking lot, according to the agreement.

The settlement, filed in federal court Wednesday in Chicago, calls for Markham to pay $225,000 to Church of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, which operates from a converted house at 16018 S. Spaulding Ave.

The fight was carried out in both federal and Cook County Circuit Court.

The Rev. Reginald McCracken, pastor of the church, said Friday that he is “really happy that this is a situation that is behind us and we can move on and do the work of Christ.”

While he didn’t have a vote in approving the settlement agreement, Markham Mayor Roger said city officials believed there “was no sense of taking it any further” in the courts.

“We just want to do the right thing,” he said Friday. “Let’s move on and try to live together.”

Markham officials had sought in Cook County Circuit Court an injunction to stop the church from holding services, but that lawsuit has been dropped as a result of the settlement, according to Noel Sterett, an attorney who represented the church.

In January, the 7th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals reversed a federal judge’s ruling that had favored the city and sent the case back to federal court for reconsideration, which led to the settlement.

The church has operated from a home for more than 15 years, and Markham filed suit in circuit court in November 2012 seeking an injunction to stop the church from holding worship services.

The church was initially denied a permit by the city to operate, then later granted a conditional permit, Sterett said. The church filed a lawsuit in federal court in the summer of 2013, alleging among other things that Markham’s zoning code unfairly treats religious and non-religious uses differently.

One issue the city had complained of was insufficient off-street parking, and the settlement requires the church to construct a parking lot, which McCracken said is underway.

He had bought the home in 1985 as a personal residence, and the congregation began holding worship services there in 2003. McCracken later bought another house near the church property, and also owns two adjacent properties where church members park for worship services, Sterett said.

Standing inside the church, McCracken points out that what used to be the home’s living room and attached garage serve as the sanctuary.

The church would typically draw about 40 people for worship, but that number has dwindled to about 15, largely because of the ongoing legal battle, he said.

“It took a great toll on us,” McCracken said.

Money spent on legal fees early in the case “were tremendous,” forcing the church to let go musicians as well as a caretaker for the property, he said.

McCracken said he does not draw a salary as pastor. He said he worked for 39 years for the University of Chicago, including his last 10 years as assistant to the dean of students for the university’s Booth School of Business. He said he had to dip into his pension to make city-requested improvements at the church, such as adding more washrooms.

The pastor said the legal fight took a toll on him as well.

“I never doubted my faith but sometimes I doubted myself,” he said. “There were times I wanted to give up.”

The dispute mirrored obstacles that had been faced by another Markham church, Original Bible Church, which had to go to court and was ultimately successful. The church was twice denied permission by Markham to hold services in a building at 3509 W. 159th St., which the church had bought and was rehabbing to hold worship services.

In that case and the Church of Our Lord case, it was alleged that Markham had violated the federal Religious Land Use & Institutionalized Persons Act, which requires municipalities to treat religious assemblies on equal terms with nonreligious assemblies, such as movie theaters.

The settlement recognizes Church of Our Lord’s right to use the property for religious assembly, according to the agreement.

Sept. 8 and it was expected to stay open months longer.

Northerly Island remains, for most visitors to Chicago and a good chunk of its residents, out of sight and out of mind. As lovely as this park can be, its long history as a private airstrip means that it not lodged in the consciousness of most Chicagoans nor visitors to the city.

It’s subject to disruption by Soldier Field, where the fans of Chicago Bears don’t like to change what they are doing for anybody. It’s poorly served by public transportation. Despite all the promised redevelopment, the location still lacks much of a visitor infrastructure (good luck finding somewhere nearby to eat), and, for much of the year, it feels bleak. When it comes to Northerly Island, this city has not even remotely gotten its act together.

Yet more significantly, people do not just happen upon this locale and thus even the huge structure housing “Hamilton the Exhibition” mostly went unnoticed. You might contrast that with, say, the Soldier Field parking lot recently occupied by Cirque du Soleil and fully visible to the multitudes of cars passing by everyday on Lake Shore Drive. But the grand chapiteau had to be gone before the Green Bay Packers came to town.

So that’s part of the answer. There also was a lack of advertising, most likely because “Hamilton” is just not used to having to do much of that crass, profit-sapping endeavor. The hit musical — which will have grossed close to $400 million in Chicago prior to its exit on Jan. 5, 2020, — sells tickets all by itself. But that’s an extraordinary state of affairs. Almost every other tourist attraction in America spends large amounts to get its name in front of people who may well be making a last-minute decision about what they plan to do on a given day. “Hamilton the Exhibition” did not blanket the city — and, unlike the show, it did not sell itself.

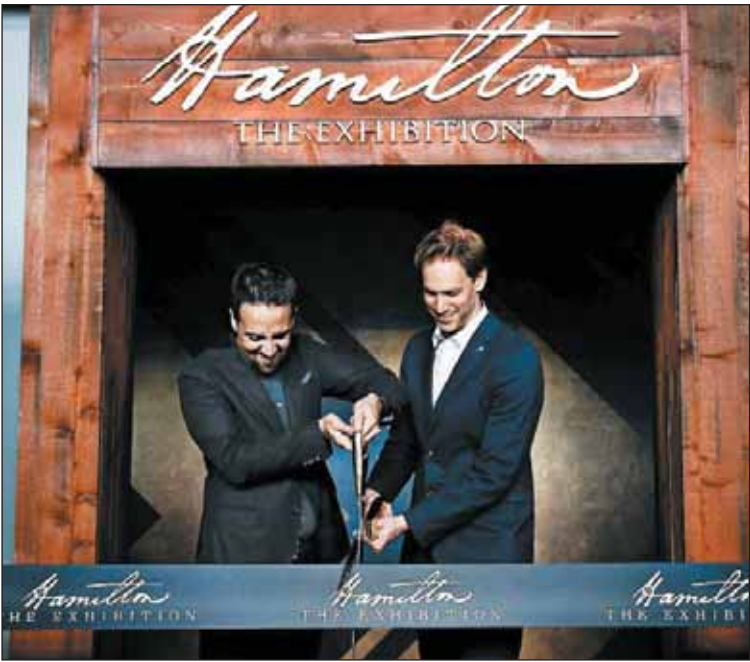

Looking back, the producers probably also are second-guessing their decision not to work with a partner, even though places like the Field Museum and the Museum of Science and Industry were eager for such a relationship. It’s understandable: going it alone meant more control and the tight-knit “Hamilton” crew has its own high standards to maintain.

But walk-through exhibitions based on cultural entities — legendary rock bands, movies, TV shows like “Downton Abbey,” hit Broadway musicals — aren’t always slam dunks. “Exhibitionism,” the exhibit about the Rolling Stones that’s now residing in friendlier confines at the Venetian Hotel in Las Vegas, also under-achieved in Chicago. Why is this? People tend to see them as brand extensions, not the highly desirable thing itself.

Attending “Exhibitionism” did not get you an audience with the strutting Mick Jagger, even though such an experience is available for cash money. Attending “Hamilton the Exhibition” did not get you “Hamilton,” even though ... well, you get the idea.

I’d argue that that the more successful “Saturday Night Live! The Experience” exhibition worked better because most people don’t ever have access to that long-running television show and thus the exhibit was a viable stand-in for the live experience. Plus “SNL” has been around for decades.

And, significantly, the “SNL” experience was a much more modest and low-cost affair.

“Hamilton the Exhibition” had far loftier goals and involved a much greater level of investment ($13 million!). That meant it was charging $39 a ticket, not $25.

By design, the intent here was not to celebrate the show, or offer backstage secrets for “Hamilton” superfans, but to focus attention on Alexander Hamilton the man, and extend the show’s long-established educational mission of renewing interest in the early years of the United States of America.

This is the painful aspect of the situation: the creative team went out of their way not to celebrate themselves, or to promote their own show, but to create a high-quality experience of impeccable scholarly bonafides. Too impeccable, maybe: “Hamilton the Exhibition” is a tad dry. It needed more fun. It needed more for those Hamilton fans.

But it is so darn smart. And honorable. And it paid attention to diverse audiences. It’s the kind of thing you wish Chicago would have embraced; this situation feels like a failure of our better selves.

Of course “Hamilton the Exhibition,” for all its design finesse, did not have much in the way of actual historical artifacts. That was not its point — the masterful designer David Korins focused on interactive storytelling and offered an immersive educational dive surely richer than most any classroom. But this approach made the thing harder to explain — and maybe, for some, it seemed like coughing up cash to eat your spinach.

Lin-Manuel Miranda, the face of “Hamilton” and a huge celebrity, did not want to pull too much focus and for all the right reasons. The desire here was to be both factual and evangelistic about American history, to excite young people about public service and appreciate the blood and the guts that went into the founding of this nation. But rather than split the narration between several voices, I’d have stuck with Lin-Manuel, the guide people want. The exhibit probably didn’t have enough “Hamilton” for superfans and yet those who have not seen the show worried that they would not understand it without that background. None of that was true, but it remained a business problem.

There is one other issue: It took far too long for the exhibit to open.

Had “Hamilton the Exhibition” opened during the wave of mania that overtook Chicago when the musical first opened here, sometime during that first ecstatic year, the excitement would have been palpable and durable. But, for one reason or another, the exhibit did not open until the show was nearing the end of its run of three years and three months. People move on too quickly these days, even when the topic is the complex founding of their own riven country.

come out of the White House, are words that I just find reprehensible,” Pritzker said. “They’re words that we’ve heard before in history. They’re words that shouldn’t be coming out of a president of the United States.”

On Saturday, Trump went after Cummings, who had pointedly questioned administration officials about conditions at the southern border.

when actually his Baltimore district is FAR WORSE and more dangerous. His district is considered the Worst in the USA.....” the president tweeted.

Trump also tweeted that Cummings’ district is a “disgusting, rat and rodent infested mess” where “no human being would want to live.”

The comments sparked widespread outrage, but Lightfoot said no Democratic presidential hopeful will be able to beat Trump if they’re “distracted” by his comments instead of laying out a vision for the country.

“I believe that no Democrat will be successful in defeating Trump unless they understand and reflect the experiences of people in the heartland, whether it’s Chicago, whether it’s Cairo, whether it’s Ohio or Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, there has to be a heartland strategy that is articulated, that is embraced, that is practical, in speaking to the needs of working class people in this country,” Lightfoot said.

Pritzker, who in a recent interview appeared to shift from his earlier call for the president to be impeached, said on Monday that Trump should be removed from office “as soon as humanly possible.”

“The only question to me is, is that going to happen with an impeachment process, or is that going to happen with an election?” Pritzker said when asked to clarify comments he made to Politico last week while in Salt Lake City for a meeting of the National Governors Association.

Noting that Pritzker called for Trump’s impeachment two years ago, Politico reported Pritzker said, “I think that we’re now a year and a quarter away from the general election, and so I think there is a question, could you actually accomplish the goal of removing the president by impeachment before he would be removed by virtue of the election. It’s a question of timing: How long would that take, how effective would that be?”

Asked who should replace Trump in the White House, Pritzker said, “Any Democrat,” but he declined to say who he’s supporting among his party’s crowded field of presidential hopefuls. Pritzker said he knows several of the would-be candidates, noting that he saw Montana Gov. Steve Bullock at the meeting in Salt Lake City.

As for issues closer to home, Pritzker skirted questions about whether he still has confidence in Illinois House Speaker Michael Madigan’s ability serve as chairman of the state Democratic Party following recent reports of raids on the homes of close allies.

The governor said he only knows what he’s read in the newspapers.

“We’ve read the stories that you all have put out, but it’s hard to tell what it’s all about,” Pritzker said.

Group: Lake Michigan drownings up 80% over 2018

Body pulled from water over weekend pushes total for year to 27

By JAVONTE ANDERSON

Lake Michigan continues to be the deadliest of the Great Lakes, with the number of drownings increasing significantly so far this year compared with last, an advocacy group that tracks drownings says.

According to the Great Lakes Surf Rescue Project, a group that tracks drownings across the Great Lakes, 27 people have drowned in Lake Michigan this year. That's 80% higher than this time last year, when there were 15 drownings.

Among the reasons there are so many drownings in Lake Michigan is that it's an attractive tourist destination, there's a high population density along the lakefront and the shape of the lake leads to more dangerous swim conditions, said Dave Benjamin, the project's executive director.

This year, more people have drowned in Lake Michigan than the other Great Lakes combined.

"The more people, the greater chance of something going wrong," Benjamin said.

Lake Michigan is 307 miles long and 118 miles wide and has more than 1,600 miles of shoreline, much of it adjacent to major cities like Chicago and Milwaukee.

Lake Michigan's length and physical makeup help create strong waves, which can build for hundreds of miles before crashing onto shore.

"When you have winds coming from the north moving south, and as the wind is able to cover that long distance, it's able to push the water from the north to south and increase those wave heights," said National Weather Service meteorologist Kyle Brown.

Another hazard in Lake Michigan is the strong structural currents that form along structures like piers and jetties, pushing people out into open water, Brown said.

Over the weekend, a 32-year-old Michigan man's body was pulled out of Lake Michigan near Indiana Dunes State Park. Last week, a 27-year-old man died after he was pulled from Lake Michigan near Rainbow Beach, a month after a 5-year-old girl died after being found in the lake there.

Water safety advocates said the best way to decrease drownings is public education.

"Water safety is not common sense," Benjamin said. "People learn how to swim all the time without any information on how to survive a drowning incident."

A memorial is displayed on 75th Street and Stewart Avenue on Sunday after Friday's shooting deaths of Andrea Stoudemire and Chantell Grant.

The cheery sight reminded Manasseh of watching Grant's three children play hopscotch on chalk drawings and getting face paintings with their mother, who never let them out of her sight. The 26-year-old's fourth child, her youngest, just turned 1, Manasseh said.

"Every day Chantell brought her kids here. Every day," Manasseh said. "By now, I should have seen Chantell at least three or four times at this point of the day. I will never see her again. I will never see Andrea again."

Stoudemire also had four children, Manasseh said. She described the 35-year-old as a fiercely protective friend who "mothered other mothers."

As the news conference progressed, one friend of Stoudemire's paced around chanting, "Rest in peace, Andrea!"

Jogwan Whitmore, 23, said he felt compelled to repeat the phrase because it was inconceivable to him that she was killed. The two became friends when Whitmore would do Stoudemire's eyebrows and makeup.

Stoudemire had just visited him for an eyebrow appointment last week after returning from a vacation in the Bahamas, Whitmore said. Days later, he heard gunshots and saw a body on the sidewalk, but he didn't know it was his friend until reading about her death Sunday.

"She was sweet, loving, a fun person to be around," Whitmore said. "Her spirit was just, it spiked the whole crowd. Why did she have to die right here? Why?"

The families of Grant and Stoudemire had planned on showing up at the news conference but were still too devastated to make it, Manasseh said. But she said mothers coming out in force Sunday renewed MASK's drive to continue occupying the corner and push for justice.

"Spraying bullets on indefensible women is total cowardice," said MASK organizer Maria Pike, 65, the mother of Ricky Pike, an aspiring chef gunned down in 2012. "They are a bunch of cowards. They have to be caught as soon as possible."

10-year-old boy, 2 cousins shot in East Garfield Park

By ALICE YIN

Twelve-year-old Nylia was walking to buy a pizza for her younger brother and two cousins Sunday evening when all three boys were hit as a dozen shots rang out.

The gunfire came from a red Toyota Carolla that had circled the block in East Garfield Park once before stopping in front of the children around 6:10 p.m. The people inside wore masks and had their hoods pulled up.

"When I walked past them, then they start shooting," the 12-year-old said. "I was scared and I was crying."

Nylia's 10-year-old brother and her cousins, 14 and 15, were shot as they stood on the sidewalk in the 300 block of North Francisco Avenue. The 10-year-old was grazed in the leg and buttocks, the 14-year-old was grazed in the arm and the 15-year-old was grazed in both legs.

All the boys were taken to Stroger Hospital in good condition, police said. No one was in custody.

Nylia said she and the other children found refuge at her grandmother's house, where she asked her brother whether he was hurt. The 10-year-old looked confused while holding onto his leg.

"He came running to me and told me he was hit," said Linda Davis, the grandmother. "He was shaking and scared."

Davis said she began sobbing as the boy showed her where the bullet grazed him. After following the ambulances to Stroger and being told the boy would survive, she calmed down. "I'm OK now cause they're OK."

The three were among at least 47 people shot over the weekend, eight of them fatally.

About three hours after the shooting on Francisco, three men and a woman were wounded in the 3900 block of West Roosevelt Road in Lawndale by someone in a passing car. About two hours later, two women and a man were shot in the 13000 block of South Evans Avenue in the Altgeld Gardens neighborhood when a gunman walked up and opened fire, police said.

Nylia's aunt said he was perplexed by the gun violence that spilled out so close to her house, which she has always thought of as a safe place. And she hopes criminal charges are coming against the person who would dare shoot at her grandson and his cousins.

"My grandson ain't no gang-banger," Davis said. "He's 10 years old, he stay with me. I keep an eye on them. I really keep an eye on them."

At the scene of the shooting, yellow tape closed off the block of Francisco Avenue just north of West Fulton Street. At least a dozen shell casings were on the street and sidewalk on Francisco, where two chairs were set up and children continued playing outside and biking just beyond the crime scene.

Over an hour after the shooting, Nylia hung out by her grandmother's stoop after leaving Stroger with the hopeful news of her brother's condition. When asked what she planned to do the rest of the night, she shrugged.

An older relative suggested going home and sleeping, causing her to pipe up, "I got to wait for my brother first."

Illinois EPA cites suburban water supplier

By ZAK KOESKE

Illinois Environmental Protection Agency officials cited Aqua Illinois for a series of alleged violations related to ongoing lead water contamination issues in University Park that persist more than a month after they were detected.

IEPA officials issued the water supplier a notice Thursday detailing six alleged violations of environmental laws, regulations or permits identified during the course of an agency investigation initiated last month after the company detected elevated lead levels in 15 University Park properties.

Aqua officials said in a statement Friday they were working with IEPA to resolve the issue.

"Although we continue working to gather the necessary information to gain a more comprehensive understanding of what took place, it is important to note we don't believe the issues associated with these notices of violations contributed to or worsened the lead contamination in University Park," company officials said in a statement.

Aqua officials said they had suspended four members of their management and professional team in response to IEPA's findings and would continue to evaluate changes to processes and personnel as they attempted to correct the situation and improve their service for customers and communities.

IEPA's violation notice cites Aqua for deficiencies in its permitting and sampling processes; for failing to properly categorize lead and copper sampling sites; and for failing to maintain a safe public water supply.

The company allegedly failed to secure construction and operating permits from the state before adding blended phosphate to the water supply at its Central Avenue booster station in December 2017, and failed to obtain an operating permit before activating its water transmission main to University Park the same month, according to the IEPA notice.

In a statement, company officials acknowledged that in the process of changing water sources from well water to the Kankakee River in 2018, the company had installed a water main and changed treatment locations without an IEPA permit.

Aqua officials, who ultimately applied for and were granted the necessary permits by the agency several months later, called their delay in applying for them "an oversight" and said they had updated internal permit management practices as a result.

IEPA officials also cited the company for allegedly failing to properly categorize lead and copper sampling sites according to the regulations for the University Park distribution system. All public water suppliers must categorize their sampling pool according to approved tiers and in a way that is representative of water throughout the distribution system.

Aqua officials, however, conceded in their statement that several homes the company had selected for compliance sampling did not meet proper criteria due to their age.

IEPA docked Aqua for allegedly failing to collect the required number of lead and copper samples from the University Park distribution system during the final six months of 2018.

Company officials said Friday that the safety of the water system was their top priority and that they would continue to work to restore and maintain safe drinking water for their customers.

Police investigate Calif. shooting

Cops slay gunman after he killed 2 kids, 1 other at festival

By KATHLEEN RONAYNE
Associated Press

GILROY, Calif. — Authorities on Monday were searching for answers to why a 19-year-old opened fire on a popular food festival less than a mile from his parents' home in California, killing two children and another young man, but believe many more people would have died if officers patrolling the event had not stopped the gunman so quickly.

Santino William Legan, 19, cut through a fence and appeared to randomly target people with an "assault-type rifle" Sunday afternoon, the end of the three-day Gilroy Garlic Festival that attracts about 100,000 people to the city known as the "Garlic Capital of the World," Gilroy Police Chief Scot Smithee said.

Police responded in less than a minute, and Legan turned his "AK-47-type" gun on them, Smithee said. Three officers fired back and killed Legan, who legally purchased the weapon this month in Nevada, where his last address is listed.

"I can't tell you how proud I am of the officers who were able to engage this guy as quickly as they did," the police chief said. "We had thousands of people there. It could have gone so much worse so fast. ... There absolutely would have been more bloodshed."

Legan's motive wasn't known, Smithee said. Legan posted two photos on Instagram not long before the attack that injured 12 other people.

One photo depicted Smokey Bear in front of a "fire danger" sign, with a caption that said to read the 19th century book "Might is Right," a work that claims race determines behavior and is popular among white nationalists and far-right extremist groups.

Legan's since-deleted Instagram account says he is Italian and Iranian. Minutes before the shooting, he had posted a photo from the festival saying, "Ayyy garlic festival time" and "come get wasted on overpriced (stuff)."

The festival in the agricultural city of 50,000 about 80 miles southeast of San Francisco had security that required people to pass through metal detectors and have their bags searched.

The shooter sneaked in through a fence that borders a parking lot next to a creek, Smithee said, and the gunfire sent panicked people running away and diving for cover under tables and a concert stage.

Some witnesses reported a second suspect, Smithee said, but it was unclear whether that person was armed or just helped in some way. A manhunt stretched into Monday.

The shooting killed 6-year-old Stephen Romero, a 13-year-old girl and recent college graduate Trevor Irby, who was in his 20s, authorities and family said.

"My son had his whole life to live, and he was only 6," Alberto Romero told San Francisco Bay Area news station KNTV. "That's all I can say."

The boy's grandmother, Maribel Romero, told Los Angeles station KABC-TV that she searched several hospitals before learning he had died. She said Stephen was "always kind, happy and, you know, playful."

Keuka College said Irby was a biology major who graduated in 2017 from the school in upstate New York.

Officials didn't release the name of the girl who died. The wounded were taken to multiple hospitals, and their conditions ranged from fair to critical, with some undergoing surgery. At least five have been released.

Police searched the two-story home of Legan's family less than a mile from the garlic festival and a dusty car parked outside before leaving the house Monday with paper bags and what appeared to be other evidence.

Jan Dickson, a neighbor across the street, said Santino Legan had not lived there for at least a year and that SWAT officers came to the home Sunday night. She called the Legans "a nice, normal family."

"How do you cope with this? They have to deal with the fact that their son did this terrible thing and that he died," Dickson said.

The Gilroy Garlic Festival features food, cooking contests and music and is a decades-old staple in the city. Authorities said police, paramedics and firefighters were stationed throughout the event.

The band TinMan was starting an encore Sunday when the shooting started. Singer Jack van Breen said he saw a man wearing a green shirt and grayish handkerchief around his neck fire into the food area.

Van Breen, from nearby Santa Clara, said he heard someone shout: "Why are you doing this?" The reply: "Because I'm really angry."

The audience began screaming and running, and the five members of the band and others dove under the stage.

Bandmate Vlad Malinovsky said he heard a lot of shots and then it stopped. Later, law enforcement told those hiding to come out with their hands up.

Donna Carlson of Reno, Nevada, was helping a friend at a jewelry booth when "all of a sudden it was pop, pop, pop. And I said, 'I sure hope that's fireworks.'" She got on her hands and knees and hid behind a table until police told her it was safe to leave.

President Donald Trump condemned the "wicked murderer."

"We express our deepest sadness and sorrow for the families who lost a precious loved one in the horrific shooting last night in Gilroy, California," Trump said before an event at the White House.

In a tweet, California Gov. Gavin Newsom called the bloodshed "nothing short of horrific" and said he was grateful for the police response.

Video posted to social media showed people running in terror as shots rang out.

First responders and their families celebrate as President Trump signs the bill.

Trump signs 9/11 victims' compensation fund extension

By JILL COLVIN AND JONATHAN LEMIRE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump on Monday signed a bill ensuring that a victims' compensation fund helping those affected by the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks never runs out of money, ending years of legislative gridlock as the number of first responders dying of ground zero-related illnesses mounted.

Appearing in the Rose Garden with more than 60 first responders from the 2001 terrorist attacks, Trump signed into law an extension of the fund through 2092, essentially making it permanent.

"You inspire all of humanity," Trump said of the "true American warriors" who rushed to assist victims that day and searched for remains for months after.

The president said that the nation has a "sacred obligation" to care for the responders and their families.

The $74 billion fund had been rapidly depleting, and administrators recently cut benefit payments by up to 70%. The bill passed Congress on a bipartisan basis but only after delays by some Republicans exposed the legislative branch to brutal criticism from activists, including the comedian Jon Stewart.

Dozens of first responders, many gravely ill, would repeatedly travel to Washington to lobby lawmakers to extend the funding every time it needed to be reauthorized. Though their ranks shrunk, as emergency workers died of cancers and other diseases linked to the toxic debris from the World Trade Center rubble, the fate of the funding had never been permanently guaranteed.

NYPD detective Luis Alvarez appeared gaunt and ill when he testified before Congress last month, urging lawmakers to pass the measure to help his fellow first responders even if it was too late for him.

"You made me come down here the day before my 69th round of chemo and I'm going to make sure that you never forget to take care of the 9/11 first responders," Alvarez said.

He died two weeks later.

More than 40,000 people have applied to the fund, which covers illnesses potentially related to being at the World Trade Center site, the Pentagon or Shanksville, Pennsylvania, after the attacks. Stewart tore into the lawmakers' inaction when he testified alongside Alvarez, creating a moment that was frequently replayed on cable news.

"Hundreds died in an instant. Thousands more poured in to continue to fight for their brothers and sisters," Stewart said before the committee. "They did their jobs with courage, grace, tenacity, humility. Eighteen years later, do yours."

A pair of Republican senators, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Mike Lee of Utah, voted against the measure this month, preventing its adoption from being unanimous. Both cited the need to eliminate unnecessary spending and offset the measure with budget cuts.

The bill-signing prompted a round of applause from first responders in the Rose Garden as well as Trump's personal attorney, Rudy Giuliani, who was mayor of New York City during the attacks and was widely praised for his leadership in the aftermath of the World Trade Center collapse.

Doubts emerge about Trump pick for US intelligence chief

By ERIC TUCKER,
MARY CLARE JALONICK AND DEB RIECHMANN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Donald Trump's pick for national intelligence director has been mayor of a small Texas city, a federal prosecutor and a member of Congress. But questions were already emerging Monday about whether those qualifications are adequate for the position as the nation confronts threats that include foreign election interference, North Korea's nuclear ambitions and the risk of war with Iran.

Rep. John Ratcliffe's dearth of relevant experience — a departure from the decades of intelligence and foreign policy bona fides of past position holders — may especially matter at a time when current and former government officials expect Russia to interfere in the 2020 presidential election just as it did in unprecedented fashion when Trump first ran.

"Ratcliffe comes to the job with the least national security experience and the most partisan political experience of any previous director of national intelligence," said Mike Morell, a former acting CIA director who now hosts the "Intelligence Matters" podcast.

The director of national intelligence has oversight of the nation's 17 intelligence agencies. If confirmed, Ratcliffe would be the principal intelligence adviser to Trump, who has appeared determined to surround himself with vocal protectors and defenders even in national security positions that haven't historically been perceived as overtly partisan.

It is unclear, for instance, what experience he will bring in helping thwart foreign government efforts to interfere in American politics. Also unknown is whether skepticism he has voiced in Congress about special counsel Robert Mueller's Russia investigation into ties between Russia and the Trump campaign will affect his response to any foreign influence or cyberattacks on campaigns.

Ratcliffe, who was among the most aggressive Republican questioners of Mueller at public hearings last week, would replace outgoing director Dan Coats at a time of broader reshuffling within the national security leadership structure.

The selection comes two months after Trump empowered another ally, Attorney General William Barr, to declassify intelligence collected by other agencies, including the CIA, as part of the Russia investigation. Ratcliffe has made clear his skepticism of that investigation and his belief that Trump was treated improperly by investigators, saying in a talk show appearance Sunday that it was time to move on from discussion of impeachment.

"It's a moment when Donald Trump can deepen his personal stranglehold over the intelligence function and knock out any voices of dissent to his particular world view," said Democratic Rep. Jamie Raskin of Maryland.

"That's a scary thing for the country."

Coats, who will step down next month, was publicly steadfast about his conviction that Russia had interfered in the election even in the face of the president's ambivalence. He appeared to scoff when told in an interview last year that Trump had invited Putin to Washington.

In his resignation letter, he cited as an accomplishment the appointment of an election security executive "to support the whole-of-government effort to address threats against our election."

Tensions with Trump notwithstanding, Coats did bring to the job decades of Washington experience, including lengthy stints as an Indiana congressman and U.S. ambassador to Germany.

His predecessor in the Obama administration, James Clapper, spent decades in the military and in intelligence, including as director of the Defense Intelligence Agency.

Ratcliffe does not have equivalent credentials, though his supporters are likely to point to his experience as a terrorism prosecutor and federal prosecutor, as well as his recent membership on the House intelligence committee, which he joined in January.

Beijing supports Hong Kong leader, wants protests handled

BY ANNA FIFIELD
AND SHIBANI MAHTANI
The Washington Post

BEIJING — China's government put the onus for dealing with increasingly violent protests in Hong Kong squarely on the city's embattled leader, signaling Monday that it wants a political solution to the semiautonomous Chinese territory.

Beijing officials called for punishment of "radicals" involved in protests that have gripped Hong Kong in recent weeks. But they also acknowledged some causes of young people's discontent, including the need for more economic opportunity and affordable housing.

"Hong Kong will surely overcome all difficulties and challenges on its way forward," Yang Guang, a spokesman for Beijing's Hong Kong and Macao Affairs Office, said in an unprecedented news conference, adding that the central government "firmly supports" Hong Kong Chief Executive Carrie Lam.

"The ship of 'one country, two systems' will surely sail far and steady, despite winds and storms," Yang said, referring to the principle under which China agreed to give the former British colony a high degree of autonomy for 50 years following its return to Chinese sovereignty in 1997.

But signs of China's influence over Hong Kong abound. The Hong Kong and Chinese flags flew at half-staff above government offices Monday in mourning for Li Peng, the former Chinese premier known as "the Butcher of Beijing" for his role in the bloody Tiananmen Square crackdown in 1989.

It was the first time that the office, which answers to China's State Council, or Cabinet, has called a news conference.

After eight consecutive weekends of protests in Hong Kong, the decision by Chinese officials to face the media sparked speculation that Beijing might remove Lam, who has not addressed the news media for a week.

While the protests were building on Sunday, she was at a graduation ceremony for the Chinese People's Liberation Army summer camp at a barracks in Hong Kong.

She did not face the media on Monday either, as officials in Beijing spoke about the situation in Hong Kong. Instead, she gave the opening remarks at a women's empowerment forum, speaking about her government's efforts to create a conducive environment for women in the workforce without mentioning the political turmoil in the territory.

A spokesman for the Hong Kong government, replying to questions from The Post, said it would not respond to "speculative comments" about Lam's leadership.

"The Government did in fact respond to the marches over the weekend and rejected the violence used by radical protesters," the spokesman added.

In clashes over the weekend, police fired tear gas and projectiles at thousands of protesters in a densely packed neighborhood close to the downtown area.

Protesters responded with bricks, set fire to carts that they pushed close to police lines and shot at police with crossbows. Police arrested at least 49 people on Sunday, in addition to 11 who were arrested during a separate demonstration Saturday.

Italy judge: Teen claims he knifed officer in self-defense

BY FRANCES D'EMILIO
Associated Press

ROME — Two American teenagers jailed in Rome in the slaying of an Italian police officer showed "total absence of self-control," making them highly dangerous to society, a judge concluded in ordering them kept behind bars while the investigation continues.

Judge Chiara Gallo said in the ruling, obtained Monday by The Associated Press, that there were "grave" indications the California teens carried out the slaying of Carabinieri Deputy Brigadier Mario Cerciello Rega, who was stabbed 11 times Friday after he and a fellow plainclothes officer confronted the Americans as part of an investigation into a cocaine deal the two were allegedly involved in. He died shortly afterward at a hospital.

Gallo cited testimony from witnesses, including the officer's surviving partner, as well as a porter and a doorman in the Rome hotel where the teens were staying and the Americans' own, sometimes conflicting accounts, to investigators.

Finnegan Lee Elder, 19, and Gabriel Christian Natale-Hjorth, 18, were taken into custody hours after the slaying by police who said a search of their hotel room found the alleged weapon, a military-style attack knife, hidden inside the room's drop ceiling.

"It can't be forgotten that the two were looking for drugs in the course of the evening and that both had drunk alcohol as they themselves declared," the judge said in her ruling, issued late Saturday. "It's a matter of circumstances which, evaluated together with their conduct, testifies to the total absence of self-control and critical ability of the two suspects, and, as a result, makes plain their elevated social danger."

The judge said Elder told authorities he stabbed Cerciello Rega because he feared he was being strangled, but noted the teen didn't have any marks on his neck indicating an attempted strangulation.

She also cited contradictions in the teens' account: Elder told investigators that Natale-Hjorth hid the knife in the drop ceiling, while Natale-Hjorth told investigators he wasn't aware of the stabbing until Elder woke him hours later in their hotel room and told them he had "used a knife" and then washed it.

Investigators said Saturday both teens had admitted their roles in Cerciello Rega's death. Under Italian law, anyone who participated in a slaying can face murder charges.

Elder, the judge said, told investigators he didn't realize the two men were police officers and believed they were sent by an Italian man whose knapsack and cellphone they had stolen a few hours earlier while trying to arrange a drug deal.

Gallo noted that the teens claimed the officers didn't show identification. But, she said, Varriale told investigators both officers showed their badges and identified themselves as police. "But the pair, even before we could carry out any kind of check attacked us physically," she quoted Varriale as saying.

She said Varriale told investigators Cerciello Rega yelled as he was struggling with Elder, "Stop, we're Carabinieri. Enough."

He said Natale-Hjorth kicked, scratched and punched him to break away then both teens fled.

Varriale said he saw his partner bleeding profusely from his left side. "Before falling to the ground, he told me, 'They stabbed me,'" the judge quoted Varriale as saying.

Cerciello Rega was eulogized Monday as a hero at a funeral in his hometown, Somma Vesuviana.

FBI: Hacker accesses 100 million Capital One credit applications

BY DEVLIN BARRETT
The Washington Post

WASHINGTON — Capital One, the Virginia-based bank with a popular credit card business, announced Monday that a hacker had accessed about 100 million credit card applications, and investigators say thousands of Social Security and bank account numbers were also taken.

The FBI has arrested a Seattle-area woman, Paige Thompson, on a charge of computer fraud and abuse, according to court records.

The hack appears to be one of the largest data breaches ever to hit a financial services firm. In 2017, the credit-reporting company Equifax disclosed that hackers had stolen the personal information of 147 million people. Last week, it reached a $700 million settlement with U.S. regulators over that breach.

"While I am grateful that the perpetrator has been caught, I am deeply sorry for what has happened," said Richard Fairbank,

JOHANNES EISELE/GETTY-AFP

Capital One's chairman and chief executive. "I sincerely apologize for the understandable worry this incident must be causing those affected and I am committed to making it right."

The hack is expected to cost the company from $100 million to $150 million in the near term, Capital One said.

In announcing the data breach, Capital One emphasized that no credit card numbers or login credentials were compromised, nor was the vast majority of Social Security numbers on the affected applications.

It is unusual in a major hacking case for a suspect to be apprehended so quickly, and in this case, that was apparently due to boasts made online.

Thompson, who authorities say used the name "erratic" in online conversations, is suspected of "exfiltrating and stealing information, including credit card applications and other documents, from Capital One," according to a criminal complaint filed in federal court. She was ordered to remain in jail pending a detention hearing scheduled for Thursday, according to court records.

A lawyer for Thompson did not respond to a message seeking comment.

Thompson "made statements on social media for evidencing the fact that she has information of Capital One, and that she recognizes that she has acted illegally," according to the criminal complaint signed by FBI special agent Joel Martini.

In one posting, "erratic" wrote: "I've basically strapped myself with a bomb vest, (expletive) dropping capitol ones dox and admitting it," the FBI said.

come the powerful chairman of the House Oversight and Reform Committee, Trump expanded his attacks Monday to include a prominent Cummings defender, the Rev. Al Sharpton, who held a news conference in Baltimore to condemn the president.

"Al is a con man, a troublemaker, always looking for a score," Trump tweeted ahead of the news conference, adding that the civil rights activist and MSNBC host "Hates Whites & Cops!"

Sharpton fired back at the president in a tweet of his own, saying, "I do make trouble for bigots."

Meanwhile, Trump convened a group of "wonderful Inner City Pastors" for an unannounced closed-door meeting to discuss the issues facing the black community Monday.

"This country needs healing. There's so much division in America along racial lines," said Bill Owens, president of the Coalition of African American Pastors, who said he was among about 20 pastors who had met with the president.

"He wanted to know from us: What should he do in America? What best can he do?" Owens said of Trump, insisting the gathering "was not damage control."

ANDREW CABALLERO-REYNOLDS/GETTY-AFP

Rep. Elijah Cummings of the House Oversight and Reform Committee is leading several probes of the White House.

Asked by a reporter whether he thought Trump was racist, Owens said he found that "hard to believe," but said the president could do more to address racism in the country, "absolutely."

Alveda King, the niece of civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr. and a longtime Trump supporter, also noted Trump's longtime relationships with Sharpton and civil rights activist Jesse Jackson.

"These are his brothers," King said.

Trump appeared to dig a deeper hole even as a top White House aide sought to dismiss the controversy by describing Trump's comments as hyperbole. Two weeks ago, Trump caused a nationwide uproar with racist tweets directed at four Democratic congresswomen of color as he looked to stoke racial divisions for political gain heading into the 2020 election.

Trump noted that Democratic presidential contender and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders had "recently equated" parts of Baltimore to a "Third World country" in 2015 comments.

"I assume that Bernie must now be labeled a Racist, just as a Republican would if he used that term and standard," Trump tweeted Monday.

Sanders tweeted back that "Trump's lies and racism never end. While I have been fighting to lift the people of Baltimore and elsewhere out of poverty with good paying jobs, housing and health care, he has been attacking workers and the poor."

Maryland Gov. Larry Hogan, a Republican, on Monday called Trump's comments "just outrageous and inappropriate." Hogan, the new chairman of the National Governors Association, said he recently gave an address at the NGA about the angry and divisive politics that "are literally tearing America apart."

"I think enough is enough," Hogan said on the C4 Radio Show in Baltimore. "I mean, people are just completely fed up with this kind of nonsense, and why are we not focused on solving the problems and getting to work instead of who's tweeting what, and who's calling who what kind of names. I mean, it's just absurd."

Michael Steele, the state's former lieutenant governor who went on to serve as the national chairman of the Republican National Committee, said it was "reprehensible to talk about the city the way" Trump did, but he hoped the attention would elevate the conversation about how to help urban areas.

Speaking in television interviews on Sunday, acting chief of staff Mick Mulvaney said Trump was reacting in frustration to the Democrats' unrelenting investigations and talk of impeachment. He said Trump swung hard at Cummings and his Baltimore district because he believes such Capitol Hill critics are neglecting serious problems back home in their zeal to unfairly undermine his presidency.

Cummings is leading multiple investigations of the president's governmental dealings. In his direct response to Trump on Twitter, Cummings said: "Mr. President, I go home to my district daily. Each morning, I wake up, and I go and fight for my neighbors. It is my constitutional duty to conduct oversight of the Executive Branch. But, it is my moral duty to fight for my constituents."

Cummings has also drawn the president's ire for investigations touching on his family members serving in the White House. His committee voted along party lines Thursday to authorize subpoenas for personal emails and texts used for official business by top White House aides, including Ivanka Trump and her husband, Jared Kushner.

Guatemala official seeks to nullify asylum deal with US

GUATEMALA CITY — Human rights prosecutor Jordan Rodas asked the Constitutional Court on Monday to nullify a deal President Jimmy Morales’ government signed with Washington forcing Salvadorans and Hondurans to request asylum in Guatemala instead of the United States.

The appeal argues that the agreement was signed under threats from President Donald Trump, who’d warned of possible tariffs or other consequences for Guatemala if it didn’t get on board.

“Article 52 of the Vienna Convention signals that any treaty or agreement that has been obtained under threats is null,” Rodas said.

Before the signing, the Constitutional Court had granted three injunctions ordering the government not to enter into a deal without approval from the country’s Congress — a ruling it ignored.

Closing arguments begin in trial for Oakland warehouse fire

OAKLAND — Two men charged with involuntary manslaughter after a fire broke out at a California warehouse, killing 36 people, disregarded the safety of others when they illegally converted the building into a residence for artists and threw unpermitted parties there, prosecutors said Monday.

At closing arguments in the trial on charges of involuntary manslaughter against Derick Almena and Max Harris on Monday, Alameda County prosecutors said three dozen people had no notice, time or ability to escape the fast-moving fire in December 2016 because the warehouse did not have smoke alarms or sprinklers.

Federal fire officials traced the origin of the fire to a back corner of the ground floor of the warehouse. They did not determine a cause, however.

Officials say 57 dead in Brazil prison riot; 16 decapitated

RIO DE JANEIRO — At least 57 prisoners were killed by other inmates during clashes between organized crime groups in the Altamira prison in northern Brazil on Monday with 16 of the victims being decapitated, according to prison officials.

Para state prison authorities said a fight erupted around 7 a.m., between the Rio de Janeiro-based Comando Vermelho and a local criminal group known as Comando Classe A.

“Leaders of the (Comando Classe A) set fire to a cell (in a prison area) where members of the (Comando Vermelho) were located,” a statement read.

The fire prevented police forces from entering the building for several hours, authorities said.

Two prison staff members were held hostage, but eventually released.

Putin opponent sent back to jail after mysterious illness

MOSCOW — Russian opposition leader Alexei Navalny was moved back to jail from a hospital Monday even though his physician raised suspicions of a possible poisoning after he suffered facial swelling and a rash while in custody.

Details about Navalny’s condition were scarce after he was rushed to a hospital Sunday with what authorities said was a suspected allergy attack inside a detention facility where he was serving a 30-day sentence for calling an unsanctioned protest. The 43-year-old political foe of President Vladimir Putin was arrested several days before a major opposition rally Saturday that ended with nearly 1,400 people detained.

Tensions are running high in Moscow as dozens of protesters remain in custody and the opposition called for a new rally Aug. 3.

In a blog post written in detention, Navalny said he may have been exposed to an unknown chemical agent while in custody. Navalny recalled how his face started to become swollen on Saturday and it worsened the next day: “I got up in the morning, and when my cellmate saw me, he said: ‘You need to see a doctor now.’ ”

Dr. Anastasiya Vasilyeva, who has been Navalny’s physician for several years, visited him Monday shortly before he was discharged from the hospital and sent back to the detention facility even before the necessary tests were run on him.

Doctors at the hospital initially said Navalny had a severe allergy attack, but Vasilyeva said that the swelling and the rash on his face could be consistent with chemical poisoning. She said the incarceration would jeopardize his health.

UN report: 12,000 kids killed, hurt in ’18 conflicts

UNITED NATIONS — A new U.N. report says more than 12,000 children were killed and injured in armed conflicts last year, with Afghanistan, the Palestinians, Syria and Yemen topping the casualty list.

The deaths and injuries were among more than 24,000 “grave violations” against children verified by the U.N. including recruitment and use of youngsters by combatants, sexual violence, abductions, and attacks on schools and hospitals, it said.

According to Secretary-General Antonio Guterres’ annual report to the Security Council on Children and Armed Conflict, violations by armed groups remained steady but there was “an alarming increase” in the number of violations by government and international forces.

The U.N. blacklist of countries that committed grave violations remained unchanged.

Senate bows to Trump vetoes, allows weapons sales

WASHINGTON — The Senate has failed in a bid to override a series of vetoes issued by President Donald Trump, allowing the administration to move forward with plans to sell billions of dollars of weapons to Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

Trump’s decision to sell the weapons in a way that would have bypassed congressional review infuriated lawmakers from both parties.

In a bipartisan pushback, Democrats and Republicans banded together to pass resolutions that would have blocked the $8.1 billion weapons sales to the U.S. allies in the Persian Gulf.

A vote Monday to override the vetoes failed, 45-40. A two-thirds vote was needed.

The White House argued that stopping the sales would send a signal that the U.S. doesn’t stand by its partners and allies.

In Germany: An 8-year-old boy was run over by a train and killed at Frankfurt’s main station on Monday after a man pushed him and his mother onto the tracks, German police said.

The mother and then the boy were pushed onto the tracks as a high-speed ICE train was pulling into the station, one of Germany’s busiest. The mother was able to escape but the boy was hit and run over by the train and suffered fatal injuries.

The suspect then apparently tried unsuccessfully to push another person onto the track, police said.

The suspect — an Eritrean citizen, according to police — fled with passersby in pursuit before he was arrested near the station.

Every shooting in Chicago expands the circle of trauma

In Englewood on Friday night, two women who volunteered with Mothers Against Senseless Killings were shot to death on the very corner where moms and kids regularly gather to claim a space for food, games and friendliness. It was a drive-by shooting. Each woman, Chantell Grant and Andrea Stoudemire, was hit several times in the chest. Each woman had four children, the youngest of whom just turned 1 year old.

Two days later, a sister, brother and two cousins walked to get a pizza in East Garfield Park, hours before dark. A car circled around and shots blasted out, grazing three of the children. None was badly hurt by bullets. But there were psychological wounds.

“I was scared and I was crying,” said Nylia, 12, who was not injured in Sunday’s shooting. Her 10-year-old brother “came running to me and told me he was hit,” their grandmother said. “He was shaking and scared.” Their cousins, 15 and 14, also had minor injuries, reported Alice Yin in the Tribune.

These mothers and children were among at least 47 people shot in Chicago over the weekend, eight of them fatally.

Chicago’s intolerable violence presents problems of grief, terror and multiplication. Each shooting expands the number of traumatized Chicagoans: family and friends of victims, neighbors, schoolmates. They include the eight children of Grant and Stoudemire who lost their mothers. And Nylia and her brother and cousins. Even children too young to understand are busily absorbing the chaos around them.

While homicides in Chicago dropped in the last few years, the number of children younger than age 5 living in high-homicide areas grew. About 60% of Chicago’s youngest children lived in communities where 91% of homicides took place, according to a new analysis by the Chicago-based Erikson Institute, which focuses on early child development. This suggests that the problem of children exposed to violence, and cared for by adults who also suffer because of it, will have a deep hold on many of Chicago’s next generation.

Services and support haven’t kept up with science on childhood trauma. Researchers know that early exposure to violence can have lifelong effects, especially before age 5, when the brain is growing rapidly. Children exposed to chronic violence can become fearful, demonstrate aggression, anxiety, depression, sadness and have difficulty feeling secure, according to the Erikson Institute.

This is a “dire, urgent situation with children whose minds are forming every day,” said Geoffrey Nagle, president and CEO of the institute.

Nagle talks about a child’s first 1,100 days: those early years when negative experiences can have a lifelong impact on the brain. Yet there are few programs addressing the emotional needs of children younger than 5. Child psychiatrists and mental health services are in short supply. Interventions at school age are too late to offer maximum benefit. Caretakers may discourage children from dwelling on violence, while in fact, kids may need to express and work through their feelings.

MASK founder Tamar Manasseh called the killings of Chantell Grant and Andrea Stoudemire “one of the saddest nights of my life.” Now multiply that agony by eight motherless children and a full neighborhood of kids who deserve hopscotch and juice boxes, not police tape and memorials.

Gun violence in Chicago is an epidemic in more ways than one.

Is Trump’s pick the right kind of intelligence chief to replace Dan Coats?

When the news broke in January 2017 that Donald Trump would nominate Dan Coats to be director of national intelligence, the choice was applauded by senators on both sides of the aisle. “He’s not a fierce partisan and knows the intelligence community,” said Sen. Angus King of Maine, an independent who caucuses with Democrats. John McCain, R-Ariz., called him “one of my favorite people.”

Coats had spent more than three years as ambassador to Germany, arriving shortly before the 9/11 attacks. In his 16 years representing Indiana in the U.S. Senate, he served on the armed services and intelligence committees. Lawfare reported that some intelligence officials “hope that Coats will be able to bridge the gap between the intelligence community and the President-elect.”

It didn’t quite work out that way, mainly because the president preferred to preserve the gap, regularly dismissing or ignoring the conclusions of the intelligence agencies. The surprise is not that Coats is stepping down but that he lasted as long as he did.

Coats did not make points with his boss when he said Russia interfered in the 2016 election. He reported that North Korea is not moving toward denuclearization and that Iran is not pursuing nuclear weapons, contradicting the president. Trump responded to the latter claims by accusing his intelligence officials of being “passive and naive.”

Coats, it seems, fell out of favor not because of his faults but because of his virtues, principally his insistence on honestly reporting the information and conclusions produced by the U.S. intelligence apparatus. He was a poor fit with a boss

U.S. Rep. John Ratcliffe, the president’s choice to become the next director of national intelligence, has scant credentials for the job, having served just seven months on the House intelligence committee. The Senate should vet him with particular care.

who prefers to trust his own instincts over data and analysis.

Trump’s choice to take over is John Ratcliffe, a House Republican who was previously a federal prosecutor and a small-town mayor. He is expected to be more amenable to the president’s approach. Ratcliffe is a fierce partisan who gained the spotlight last week with his tongue-lashing of former special counsel Robert Mueller.

Yet he has only modest credentials for the job, having served just seven months on the intelligence committee.

There is no way to force the president to sit through intelligence briefings, to read his daily intelligence report, or to use the conclusions of his intelligence officials in formulating his policies. And we believe that as a general matter, each president is entitled to choose the people he needs to advise him and carry out his policies.

But this post requires Senate confirmation, and the Senate has an obligation to vet the nominee with particular care. The DNI oversees 16 intelligence agencies and a $53 billion budget.

The law requires the DNI to have “extensive national security expertise,” as Coats and his predecessors unquestionably did. The burden of demonstrating that Ratcliffe meets that test should be on the administration.

Senators should question him thoroughly to assess his familiarity with the issues that he would have to handle. They also need to gain confidence that he would deliver intelligence information without fear or favor.

After all, the DNI doesn’t work solely for the president; the statutory duties include providing intelligence to the military services and the congressional intelligence committees. Remember, too, that the DNI will have responsibility for assuring the 2020 elections are protected from Russian meddling. The senators should satisfy themselves that Ratcliffe would perform his tasks faithfully.

Coats did the job with independence and sound judgment. We hope the next DNI will do the same.

WHAT OTHERS ARE SAYING

Don Devine, the intrepid head of the civil service during the Reagan administration, Reagan’s “terrible swift sword,” mentioned something astonishing to me earlier this year. He said that two-thirds of the nonmilitary federal workforce, about 1.3 million persons, are mainly occupied at work in writing checks. The federal government pays something like 15 million persons to work for it, but the bulk of these are contractors of some sort. Somebody has to cut the checks for the 15 million, and who does that all day long is the greater part of the federal workforce.

How weird. Individuals numbering over a million trudge into the federal office and get to work getting these payments out, head home at the end of the day, only to gear up the next morning for the same thing. The pension at the end of it all is like “a lid on an orderly life,” as Tom Wolfe once characterized it. ...

I have realized for some years now that the most effective discipline with which to supplement political science and discern the ways and patterns of government is epidemiology, the science of disease. The thing that scares government most of all ... is a successful private sector. A cruising private sector means curtains to government. Government must have 15 million contractors, just to let the private sector lose some of its own confidence, its own mojo, which if really gets going could mean the grim reaper for government.

PUT GOP ON THE SPOT

BY TIMOTHY L. O’BRIEN

Back in February, Rep. Elijah Cummings, a black Democrat, stood up for his friend, Rep. Mark Meadows, a white Republican.

Members of Congress were fielding the testimony of President Donald Trump’s former attorney, Michael Cohen, when Rep. Rashida Tlaib, a Democrat, accused Meadows of racism for trotting out a female black Trump appointee as a stage prop during the hearing. “My nieces and nephews are people of color, not many people know that,” Meadows responded, fuming. “It’s racist to suggest that I asked her to come in here for that reason.”

Meadows, who recommended during the 2012 presidential campaign that Barack Obama be sent “back to Kenya,” also reminded the House of what he described as his record of combating racism. He asked Cummings, chair of the committee convening the Cohen hearing, to strike Tlaib’s comments from the record. “Mr. Chairman, you and I have a personal relationship that’s not based on color,” Meadows noted.

“If there’s anyone who’s sensitive with regard to race it’s me, the son of former sharecroppers,” Cummings replied. “You’re one of my best friends. I know that shocks a lot of people. But you are. And I can see and I feel your pain.” Cummings encouraged Tlaib to clarify that she wasn’t calling Meadows a racist personally, calmed down Meadows himself, and then moved the hearing along.

Over this past weekend Trump put Cummings and his Baltimore district in his crosshairs, tweeting at him 17 times in a racially-charged salvo of alternately bigoted, hostile and inaccurate insults that commenced at 7:14 a.m. EDT on Saturday and concluded at 6:49 a.m. on Monday. Baltimore and its neighboring areas, the president allowed, were a “very dangerous & filthy place” and a “rat and rodent infested mess” where “no human being would want to live.” Cummings was “incompetent” and a “brutal bully” responsible for Baltimore’s problems, a “racist” who “spends all of his time trying to hurt innocent people.” As he has done before, Trump also retweeted the musings of a far-right British pundit who is a self-described racist to make his case against Cummings.

A broad, diverse swath of Baltimore residents and supporters responded to Trump by coming to Cummings’ and their city’s defense, acknowledging that Baltimore had myriad problems, including crime and poverty, but was hardly the noxious monolith the president was slagging. #WeAreBaltimore became a ubiquitous hashtag and a rallying cry on social media. Perhaps the most poignant and powerful voice in all of that was a CNN anchor, Victor Blackwell, who was born in Baltimore and noted during a pointed, emotional broadcast on Saturday that Trump frequently uses the words “infested” and “infestation” when describing the homes or countries of people of color.

“Donald Trump has tweeted more than 43,000 times. He’s insulted thousands of people, many different types of people. But when he tweets about infestation, it’s about black and brown people,” Blackwell said. “There are challenges, no doubt. But people are proud of their community. I don’t want to sound self-righteous, but people get up and go to work there. They care for their families there. They love their children, who pledge allegiance to the flag just like people who live in districts of congressmen who support you, sir. They are Americans too.”

One person who has yet to speak out on Cummings’ behalf is his good friend, Meadows. The congressman from North Carolina, like his entire political party, has remained silent while Trump — an inveterate racist — has spent yet another weekend targeting a high-profile Democrat of color in heinous, prejudiced ways. In that context, Meadows is a proxy for the lack of political courage and moral clarity in Trump’s Republican Party.

Mick Mulvaney, the president’s acting chief of staff, sat for an interview with Fox News on Sunday and said there was nothing racist about Trump’s comments. “If I had poverty in my district like they have in Baltimore,” Mulvaney said, “I’d get fired.” (Mulvaney’s old South Carolina district does have poverty rates like Baltimore’s — as do many of the rural, red state districts that Trump avoids criticizing).

Sen. Rick Scott, a Florida Republican, went on “Meet the Press” and simply pandered to Trump when the news show’s host, Chuck Todd, asked him about the tweets aimed at Cummings. “I didn’t do the tweets, Chuck. I can’t talk about why he did what he did,” Scott said. “But I am disappointed in people like congressman Cummings who are attacking border patrol agents.”

And while the president was comfortable attacking a politician for Baltimore’s woes, he couldn’t find it in himself to hold the city’s business community equally responsible. If he had, of course, that would have brought his son-in-law Jared Kushner’s family into the line of fire. The Kushners own and operate low-income housing developments in the Baltimore area that have been plagued with allegations of legal abuses and have been fined by local authorities for more than 170 building code violations.

Trump’s distaste for cities like Baltimore isn’t new. During the 2016 presidential campaign he referred to inner cities as “ghettos” that were “more dangerous than some of the war zones.” He also painted this portrait and made a promise: “The violence. The death. The lack of education. No jobs. We’re going to work with the African American community and we’re going to solve the problem of the inner city.”

But the president has done little for troubled urban areas other than to use them as political punching bags from time to time. So what compelled him to lash out against Cummings and Baltimore this time?

Some of Trump’s language and bile was clearly inspired by and directly lifted from a “Fox & Friends” segment that aired Saturday morning about an hour before he first tweeted about Cummings. The congressman has been an aggressive critic of the humanitarian crisis along the U.S. southern border that was sparked by the president’s immigration policies, and it was the Fox piece that first tried to argue that conditions on the border were better than in parts of Baltimore.

The House Oversight Committee, which Cummings oversees, also voted recently to subpoena personal email and texts used by top White House aides, including Kushner and his wife, Ivanka Trump — which undoubtedly bothers the president.

Finally, and most troubling of all, the White House has concluded that Trump’s racist tweets and attacks on politicians of color may be an asset in the 2020 presidential campaign because it will resonate strongly “among his political base,” according to The Washington Post.

All of this explains why Trump sprang into action over the weekend. But it’s worth recognizing, too, just how comfortable the president has become with random bigotry, and with openly deploying a racism that has come naturally to him for quite some time. He might have checked himself if his party was more resolute, but he clearly understands that Meadows and the rest are there to empower him.

PERSPECTIVE

TERRENCE ANTONIO JAMES/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

The site of the former Michael Reese Hospital is one of the possibilities for a casino in Chicago.

KRISTEN MCQUEARY

The city of Chicago agreed to pay around $120,000 for a feasibility study to determine the best location for its first casino. The study is due in two weeks.

Let's do the work for free: Of the sites proposed so far, the most suitable location is the old Michael Reese Hospital campus, which closed in 2009. At 31st Street and South Cottage Grove Avenue on the Near South Side, the site is close enough to conventions and downtown to attract the TARs, aka the "tourists and revelers" crowd. I made up the acronym, but it drives home the point.

The TARs — special-occasion gamblers who visit casinos for weddings or birthdays, out-of-town conventiongoers looking for nighttime entertainment and vacationing tourists who wander around Navy Pier and Millennium Park — are not going to travel to the old U.S. Steel plant on the South Side or Roosevelt Road and Kostner Avenue on the West Side to gamble. And the TARs represent a marketing demographic a Chicago casino must lure to be successful.

The other crowd a Chicago casino needs to attract is the PADS. Those are the "play-all-day seniors." Currently, PADS shuttle around northwest Indiana and suburban Chicago for gambling entertainment. They're a more discerning clientele. Have you been to Hollywood Casino in Joliet on a Wednesday at 10 a.m.? It's a morning cabaret for retirees who want easy parking, their favorite slot machine and a free buffet coupon. The PADS are set in their routines. And they're less likely to drive to, say, Pullman.

Chicago has waited decades for the legislature to authorize a casino. As signed into law by Gov. J.B. Pritzker, a city casino will be triple the size of any existing Illinois casino, with a portion of its revenue dedicated to paying down police and fire pension debt.

Go big, Chicago. That means a casino complex with an upscale hotel or two, plenty of dining options, easy access and parking and a location that is near other entertainment venues. Make those sexy casino television commercials real-er.

The sentiment to put the casino in a struggling neighborhood, away from downtown, is well-intended. Too many South and West side communities have emptied due to crime and violence, been hurt by anti-business and high-tax policies and suffered a lack of economic growth. No question. But a casino is not going to solve those problems. Illinois has nearly 30 years of experience upon which to draw that conclusion.

The state issued its first riverboat gaming license for downstate Alton in 1991. Nine more followed. But riverboats in Illinois did not spark meaningful economic development in their host communities — certainly not the fairy tales spun to lawmakers to win approval. They began on paper as idealized, leisurely boat cruises with old-fashioned paddle wheels and a view. They inspired visions of nearby cafes, bed-and-breakfasts and retail shops.

But it didn't take long for Illinois casinos to become less romantic and more functional. They're now land-based, motionless, windowless banquet halls. Only a few have actual engines that get revved up at all. There are no Captain Stubings. Casinos have become self-contained capsules of mindless entertainment and, in some cases, despair. Nearly 13,400 individuals with gambling addiction behaviors have enrolled in programs of self-exclusion operated by the Illinois Gaming Board.

And about the money? Since 2012, when all 10 gaming licenses finally had been operational for a full year, Illinois casinos' annual gross receipts have dropped from $1.63 billion to $1.37 billion. Annual gross receipts have dropped every year since 2014. Admissions in 2018 were down 6.7% from 2017.

Casinos still make gobs of money. But the introduction of legalized video poker in bars and restaurants has diluted the market. The numbers for casinos are trending downward. That's without the six new casinos — including Chicago's — scheduled to come online, due to the legislation Pritzker signed in June.

If city leaders want to extend economic opportunity and jobs to struggling neighborhoods, there are ways to do it that make sense. Offer casino-specific job training in starved communities. Extend public transportation routes and shuttles to get people to their workplace. Set aside employment positions within the casino complex for Chicago residents who live in certain ZIP codes.

But build the casino near downtown. This is about the money. It's the only location that makes sense.

VOICE OF THE PEOPLE

Trump gives working class hope

Mary F. Warren's recent letter ("Voting against their interests," July 26) recognized the current strength of the American economy, low unemployment and U.S. stock market highs. She then mentioned the income and wealth disparities at record levels beyond other industrialized nations. She closed her letter: "Why do so many economically disadvantaged voters continue to ride the Trump train?"

I would like to address that question. Perhaps many of those Trump supporters were unemployed or had family members or friends who were, and they have now found employment in this improved economy. Maybe due to low unemployment, others found a better job with better pay, or perhaps they received a raise at their current job. In other words: They are better off today, than before Trump took office.

Certainly the long-existing disparity of wealth is not a positive. But I try to look at it in a positive way. Many of today's millionaires did not inherit their wealth. They did it the old-fashioned way through hard work and ingenuity. It gives us all hope that we can achieve the American Dream. Why else would millions of immigrants from around the world risk their lives trying to enter our great country?

You don't have to love or admire Trump to recognize that he has given hope and help to a lot of lower-income people.

— Pat Martino, Chicago

Real enemies of democracy

Donald Trump, smug and overconfident and riding high following Robert Mueller's testimony, called the Democrats a bunch of clowns.

This is what our nation has come to, constant bickering and finger-pointing between bitter rivals.

In the meantime, the real enemies of our country are going behind our backs plotting new strategies to undermine our democracy. At what point in time, if ever, does a majority of elected officials finally decide this has gone on long enough?

And while a case can be made that the Democrats are a chaotic band of bozos, they alone have shown the patriotic fervor that once identified our courageous forefathers.

— Earl Lee, Elgin

Partisan hatred hurts us

The thinking in California (as reported in the Christian Science Monitor):

"Fewer than a quarter of California's registered voters today are Republicans, and Democrats have a supermajority that renders the GOP powerless in the legislature. In recent months, Governor (Gavin) Newsom has cast Republicans as xenophobes and nativists, destined for the 'waste bin of history.'"

And I thought the parties had respect for the other, even as they agreed to be of different opinions. How can we move ahead if we cannot listen to others' opinions?

— William Drezdson, Des Plaines

Not quite the big win for Trump

Special counsel Robert Mueller finally spoke. True to his word, he did stick to the report. It allowed many people, if they had not read the report, to hear the excerpts and explanations from the report's main writer. We see again that the Russians made massive attempts to influence the 2016 elections, and President Donald Trump and his campaign welcomed them with open arms, even though the Trump campaign knew much of the Russian information was obtained by illegal means. We see that Trump's denials and claims of fake news were distortions of the truth on his part. We see that Trump was not exonerated from collusion with the Russians. Rather, the report concluded that there was insufficient evidence at this time to pursue criminal conspiracy.

We also see that the investigation could not exonerate Trump from obstruction of justice. In fact, Mueller testified that Trump's written testimony was not only incomplete, but also misleading. And what did Trump say about all this? He said: "A great day for me."

That is like Al Capone saying after the St. Valentine's Day Massacre: "A great day for me since I did not get charged with a crime."

— Glen Phillips, Pittsfield

God has a sense of humor

And God laughed.

Why create new gambling laws when we don't enforce our existing ones?

BY MARC EDELMAN AND JOHN HOLDEN

Back in 2016, a well-regarded federal judge in Oklahoma questioned whether it was even worth sentencing to prison two men who ran an illegal sports betting operation. The judge's reason for hesitating was, in part, because "legal" sports betting already had become ubiquitous in the United States. In all likelihood, this was a reference to daily fantasy sports.

Although the founders of daily fantasy sports companies such as FanDuel and DraftKings have long proclaimed their contests are legally distinct from prohibited forms of sports betting, their argument at times has overstepped. For example, they point to a narrow carve-out based in federal law that allows payment processors to accept funds from bona fide fantasy sports contests. But they ignore the fact this law does not exonerate contest operators who separately run their games in violation of state law.

As time progressed, some state legislators questioned whether daily fantasy sports games were even legal in certain jurisdictions in which they operated. In a number of states, such as Illinois, Texas and Hawaii, state attorneys general issued legal opinions that concluded daily fantasy sports games violated state gambling laws.

Meanwhile, in New York, the state attorney general filed a lawsuit to shut down FanDuel and DraftKings for allegedly violating various New York gambling laws. FanDuel and DraftKings thereafter voluntarily left Hawaii and temporarily ceased business in New York. But, DraftKings remained active in Texas, and both companies continued to operate in Illinois, despite adverse determinations by attorneys general in those states. To date, neither company has faced any legal consequences for their actions.

As more time passed, DraftKings and FanDuel grew larger and forged stronger relationships with U.S. professional sports leagues, including Major League Baseball and the National Basketball Association. By this time, both companies had moved even further away from the traditional definition of fantasy sports and had begun to offer "fantasy sports" contests based on single football games, single NASCAR races and single golf tournaments, even though the legal carve-out that they had argued distinguished their activities from illegal sports gambling only insulated contests based on "multiple real-world events." Once again, neither company has faced any legal challenge over this conduct.

FanDuel and DraftKings operated in conflict with the legal opinions of attorneys general in certain states, used lobbyists to draft new laws in their favor in other states and showed a level of risk tolerance that has bordered at times on willful indifference. In doing so, they created sufficient brand equity that allowed them, once the U.S. Supreme Court in 2018's Murphy v. NCAA lifted the federal ban on sports gambling, to shed their claims of operating exclusively within the regal realm of fantasy sports and emerge as the two most recognizable national brands in activities that even they concede constitute sports gambling.

All the while, there are many would-be sports gambling entrepreneurs who still remain on the sidelines, frozen out of the market because they sought reasonable legal clearance before launching online contests that could have been construed as illegal forms of gambling in many states.

The perverse lesson that we learn from all of this is that, at least in the gambling space, genuinely attempting to comply with existing state and federal laws does not get one very far. Those companies that seek legal permission are bound to lose out to those that act first and beg for forgiveness (or lobby for it) later.

Over the past year, more than 20 states and the federal government have introduced new legislation to regulate sports gambling in the aftermath of the Supreme Court's Murphy ruling. But, why even bother to pass new gambling laws if the attorneys general in states such as Illinois and Texas, as well as those on the federal level, continue to ignore the laws we have?

If history serves as any reasonable prediction of what the future will bring, new gambling laws will only serve to create opportunities for those individuals who are willing to ignore their stated limits, while punishing those individuals who mistakenly believe these laws will be stringently and uniformly enforced. This is not a good look for a country that prides itself on equal treatment under the law, and it perhaps serves as sufficient reason against creating new gambling laws in the first instance.

Cresco Labs puts sunny spin on pot revolution

Changes in name, look of dispensaries to make them warmer, inviting

BY ALLY MAROTTI

Cresco Labs is renovating its 56 marijuana dispensaries around the country, including five in Illinois, and reopening them under a single brand name: Sunnyside.

The dispensaries will be welcoming and bright and will create room for customers to learn about the products, said Joe Caltabiano, president and co-founder of the Chicago-based cannabis company. There will be light wood tones and sunflower-colored accents.

The idea is to make the marijuana purchasing experience more inviting and warm — that's where the name Sunnyside came from, Caltabiano said. Marijuana retail locations often have opened in industrial areas instead of more highly trafficked retail corridors, he said.

CRESCO LABS

An artist's rendering from Cresco Labs depicts the way their dispensaries will look after a renovation and rebranding effort.

"We want this store to fit in the retail corridors that exist within the city of Chicago and the surrounding areas," he said. "As you're walking down the street and seeing the new retail stores pop up and the new retail concepts that come, you can kind of figure out where those stores typically go. We don't want this to be different."

The move comes as Illinois operators prepare for sales of recreational marijuana to start Jan. 1. The law Gov. Pritzker signed last month allows existing medical dispensaries to apply to sell recreational marijuana from the same location. They may also apply to open a second location.

Cresco plans to open five new Sunnyside dispensaries in Illinois, and rebrand its five existing dispensaries as Sunnyside locations by the time recreational sales start, Caltabiano said. The company plans to relocate some of those existing medical dispensaries, including one near Wrigley Field.

The dispensaries will have an area where customers can learn about the products and touch the packaging, reminiscent of a shopping experience at an Apple or Whole Foods store, where consumers can feel and interact with a product before buying, Caltabiano said.

If someone is having trouble sleeping, for example, they'll know which part of the store to go to to find the right products. The line to pay will be separate.

Caltabiano said that too often, dispensaries are configured in a way that doesn't give customers a space to learn about and interact with the products before deciding whether to purchase them. "You stand in line then when you get to the counter you've got to make your decision on the fly," he said. "This topic really needs to be explained more and that retail

O'Hare looking to speed up screening

Fingerprint, iris scans could be used at security checkpoints

BY LAUREN ZUMBACH

A company that aims to offer travelers a quicker route through airport security is seeking approval to land at Chicago's airports.

It's part of a partnership between United Airlines and Clear, which uses a fingerprint or iris scan to verify enrolled travelers' identities at airport security checkpoints. Passengers still need to go through airport security screening, according to Clear.

Chicago-based United said Monday it was making an investment in Clear that would help the company expand, including plans to bring Clear to United's Newark and Houston hubs later this summer.

Clear said it is interested in expanding to both Chicago airports. United said it is supporting the company's effort to open at O'Hare "in the coming months."

Clear needs the City Council's approval to set up dedicated lanes at O'Hare and Midway Airports, Matthew McGrath, a spokesman for the city's Department of Aviation, said in an email. An ordinance authorizing agreements between the city and Clear was introduced last week and could be approved in September at the earliest, but the Aviation Department is eager to see it move forward, McGrath said.

United also said it would give its top-tier frequent flyers free access to the service, with discounted memberships costing $109 or $119 per year for other frequent flyer program members. Enrolling in Clear normally costs $179 per year.

By early afternoon on Monday, nearly 1,000 people had signed up for free or reduced memberships, said Michael Covey, United's managing director of MileagePlus Programs.

Canadian e-commerce company Shopify said in June that it would get into the fulfillment business, rivaling Amazon.

Shopify looking to rival Amazon's dominance

Canadian company makes inroads in fulfillment business

BY SIMRAN JAGDEV

Bloomberg News

Same-day shipping is becoming the norm for online shoppers but for smaller merchants it can be a logistical nightmare.

That's where Shopify Inc. can step in, says Ric Kostick, chief executive of 100% PURE.

The natural skin care company ships up to 5,000 orders a day from its own warehouse in San Jose, California. That works fine for customers on the West Coast but it can take up to a week to get its bamboo blur powder and coconut shower gel to the rest of the U.S. The company contemplated setting up an East Coast warehouse but the prospect was technically daunting.

"The hardest thing is programming the technology to route the packages the right way and route the orders based on what a customer orders and what inventory is available at each site. Shopify has built the technology to calculate this," says Kostick, who co-founded 100% PURE in 2004. "This is something I've wanted for years."

When Shopify said in June that it was moving into the fulfillment business — essentially charging online merchants to store and ship their products — the shares spiked and analysts began talking about the upstart as a potential competitor to Amazon.com.

It's unlikely to become a serious threat to Amazon at this point. But many analysts believe the Canadian company's decision to add logistics to its range of online services is smart because it could help keep customers loyal, fend off competition and create an additional source of revenue. The move also could potentially pry small merchants from Amazon, which is focusing more on megabrands like Procter & Gamble Co.

"A merchant is doing tens of millions of dollars in revenue but their fulfillment is a complete mess and that could prevent them from being successful," says Taylor Sicard, a former Shopify employee who now runs a company that helps merchants set up e-commerce businesses. "It is a massive opportunity for Shopify."

Founded in 2006, Shopify had a simple pitch: Pay us $29 a month and we'll give you all the tools required to start an online business. Many Shopify customers fail, but the more successful they are, the more money Shopify makes through transaction fees and higher-priced subscription tiers. Its Shopify Plus premium

Report: Northwestern ranked among top 10 in the country

Hospital takes No. 1 spot as the best in state for eighth year in a row

BY LISA SCHENCKER

Northwestern Memorial Hospital is on a winning streak with U.S. News & World Report, which has again ranked the Chicago hospital as the best in Illinois and, this year, as one of the top 10 in the country.

Northwestern was the only Illinois hospital to earn a spot on the publication's national top 20 list. It is the eighth consecutive year Northwestern has taken the No. 1 spot in Illinois.

In the state ranking, University of Chicago Medical Center ranked second and NorthShore University HealthSystem and Rush University Medical Center tied for third.

Hospitals often tout high rankings to prospective patients, though some experts warn against placing too much emphasis on them. A number of organizations rate hospitals, and they all have unique methodologies that produce different results. Those results are a hot topic of debate among hospitals, which compete for patients and the dollars that come with them.

U.S. News ranks hospitals on factors including survival and readmission rates, patient experience, patient safety and nursing quality. Most of the data are from Medicare.

This year, the publication changed its methodology for ranking hospitals, including by looking at how often patients go directly home from hospitals rather than to nursing homes or other institutional settings. The publication also changed the way it accounts for the types of patients a hospital treats, in an effort to make sure that hospitals serving sicker patients aren't penalized.

The new methodology also gave less weight to deaths in hospitals.

Northwestern's ranking this year is a reflection of the expertise and dedication of the hospital's doctors, nurses and staff, Julie Creamer, hospital president, said in a statement. Last year under the old methodology, Northwestern ranked 13th in the country.

University of Chicago Medical Center also saw its ranking improve under the new methodology, jumping from fourth in the state last year to second this year. University of Chicago Medicine Chief Medical Officer Dr. Stephen Weber credited his hospital's performance to how doctors treat patients and to better documenting patients' complex conditions, so the hospital gets credit for those complexities in the rankings.

ZBIGNIEW BZDAK/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

For the eighth year in a row, Northwestern Memorial Hospital has been named the best in the state by U.S. News & World Report.

Still, he doesn't consider the U.S. News rating to be the final word on quality.

"Every rating is imperfect. They're just imperfect in different ways," Weber said. "We've had a difficult relationship over the years in thinking about U.S. News and World Report because, frankly, we think they underem-

Fed set to cut rates for first time in decade

Some worry central bank will be taking needless risk

BY MARTIN CRUTSINGER AND STAN CHOE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There's little dispute that the Federal Reserve this week will do something it hasn't done since 2008, when the U.S. economy was gripped by the Great Recession: Cut its benchmark interest rate.

This time, by contrast, the economy is solid by most measures. Consumers are spending. Unemployment is close to a half-century low. A recession hardly seems imminent.

Yet the Fed under Chairman Jerome Powell has signaled that rising economic pressures — notably from President Donald Trump's trade wars and from a global slowdown — have become cause for concern. So has an inflation rate

ANDREW HARRER/BLOOMBERG NEWS

The Fed under Chairman Jerome Powell has signaled that rising economic pressures have become cause for concern.

that remains chronically below the Fed's target level.

So the Fed has decided that a rate cut now — and possibly one or more additional cuts to follow — could help inoculate the economy against a potential downturn. The idea is that lowering its key short-term rate, which can affect consumer and business loans, could encourage borrowing and spending and energize the economy.

Wall Street has welcomed that prospect. Since the start of the year, the mood of investors has swung decisively from angst about potentially higher rates to elation over the prospect of looser credit. That has helped drive a stock market rally.

Still, skeptics wonder whether Fed rate cuts at this point would really do much to bolster an economy whose borrowing rates are already low. Some even worry that the central bank will be taking a needless risk: By cutting rates now, the Fed is disarming itself of some ammunition it would need in case the economy did slide toward a recession.

Powell will surely be asked about these concerns at a news conference Wednesday after the Fed ends its latest meeting with a policy statement. Reporters will likely also press him about the likelihood of further rate cuts to follow.

Trump kept up his drumbeat of criticism, complaining in tweets Monday that the Fed raised rates “way too early and way too much” and a small rate cut now “is not enough.”

Two government reports last week — on economic growth during the April-June quarter and orders for durable manufactured goods — confirmed that the economy remains on firm footing even with pressures at home and abroad. As a result, some analysts believe the Fed may pause after Wednesday's rate cut to see if the economic outlook further brightens before deciding on any further easing.

The Fed's current rate policy marks the continuation of an abrupt policy shift beginning early this year. In December, the Fed had raised its benchmark rate for the fourth time in 2018 and projected two additional rate increases in 2019. At the time, Powell also suggested that the Fed would keep reducing its bond portfolio indefinitely — a step that would further contribute to higher rates. Stock prices tumbled for days afterward.

In January, Powell and the Fed signaled a sudden policy shift — indicating that they would be “patient” about any changes in rates and implying that rate hikes were off the table.

After U.S.-China trade talks collapsed in May, the Fed went further and began considering acting to sustain the economic expansion, which has just become the longest on record.

Yet now, with U.S.-China trade talks back on track and signs of a resilient U.S. economy, some are wondering why the Fed is considering a rate cut. One theory is that the policymakers have so clearly signaled that a cut is coming that they must follow through on it.

Mark Zandi, chief economist at Moody's Analytics, said he thinks that in the absence of any economic calamity, only one rate cut is likely this year. David Jones, an economist who has written books about the Fed, agrees with that forecast.

“The market is getting ahead of itself in expecting a series of rate cuts,” Jones said.

Pfizer to merge its off-patent drug business with EpiPen maker Mylan

BY LINDA A. JOHNSON

Pfizer, the country's largest drugmaker, is creating a hybrid new drug company by combining its off-patent branded drug business with the generic pharmaceutical company Mylan.

The two companies said Monday that they'll ultimately spin off the combination of Mylan, a $10 billion company, with Pfizer's Upjohn, which sells one-time blockbuster drugs like Viagra and Lipitor that have lost patent protection.

The complex deal, expected to close in the middle of next year, will create a company with estimated 2020 revenue in excess of $19 billion, with sales in more than 165 countries. The name for the new company has yet to be determined.

The two companies have worked together for years. Pfizer manufactures Mylan's EpiPen, an auto-injector used to halt life-threatening allergic reactions. Mylan was heavily criticized, and its CEO Heather Bresch was brought before Congress two years ago, to answer questions about the price of the EpiPen, which had jumped five-fold to $600 for two EpiPens. They have been in short supply for more than a year because of quality problems and upgrades at a Pfizer factory.

Upjohn, the name of one of the companies Pfizer gobbled up during a spate of acquisitions in the 1990s and 2000s, sells off-patent and generic drugs that include the stars that drove Pfizer's growth: pain killers Celebrex and Lyrica, Norvasc for high blood pressure, Effexor for severe heartburn, Xanax for anxiety and Zoloft for depression.

The strengthening ties between Pfizer and Mylan come at a precarious time for big drugmakers, who face enormous pressure to cut high prices for brand-name drugs. Also, Pfizer just got generic competition to one of its bigger sellers, Lyrica.

Likewise, years of pressure from wholesalers to reduce prices for generic drugs, which comprise most of Mylan's portfolio, have crimped its profits and driven its share price down 50% in the past year.

That enabled Pfizer to “combine businesses at a more attractive price,” Edward Jones analyst Ashtyn Evans said, adding that Pfizer has wanted to become a smaller, more innovative company and now has a strong pipeline of experimental new drugs.

“Growth from new, innovative products will have a bigger impact,” she said, “growing off a smaller base.”

Pfizer Inc. investors will be getting shares in the new company tax free — and that entity will be offering a dividend as well.

Shareholders of Pfizer will receive 0.12 share of the new company for each Pfizer share they hold and will own 57% of the combined new company; Mylan shareholders will own 43%, receiving one share of the new company for each of their Mylan shares.

Mylan shares jumped 14% to $21.02 in early trading. Pfizer shares, down from a $46 high late last year, dipped $1.08, or 2.5%, to $42.01.

The new company will be incorporated in Delaware and run operations in Pittsburgh, Hyderabad, India, and Shanghai, Upjohn's current base.

Mylan, which had moved its legal location from Pennsylvania to Hertfordshire, England, will legally move back to the U.S. Pfizer is based in New York. Pfizer spent several years unsuccessfully trying to drugmakers based in lower-tax European countries so it could move there on paper and reduce its U.S. tax bill, finally giving up after the U.S. tax overhaul last year changed the economics of such a maneuver.

The new company will be run by Michael Goettler, head of Upjohn, and will have Mylan's current board chairman, Robert Coury as its executive chairman. Bresch, the Mylan CEO, will retire when the deal closes.

Upjohn currently brings in roughly 23% of Pfizer's total sales, which was $53.6 billion last year.

Upjohn will issue $12 billion of debt at or prior to separation, with gross debt proceeds kept by Pfizer. The new company will have about $24.5 billion of total debt outstanding at closing.

Shopify

service, which counts Kylie Jenner, The New York Times and 100% PURE as its customers, can cost at least $2,000 per month.

Investors love the model. Shopify shares have soared more than 1,800% since the company went public in May 2015, making it one of Canada's most successful startups. The stock has been hitting records almost daily and has a market value of $37 billion, bigger than two of Canada's oldest financial heavyweights, Manulife Financial Corp. and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

But Shopify has struggled to make a profit and is poised to report a net loss of $35 million on sales of $320 million for the second quarter on Aug. 1, according to the average of analyst estimates compiled by Bloomberg.

As the company matures, meanwhile, it will be harder to sustain the average 74% year-over-year revenue growth rates it has managed over the past three years. There are also concerns that Shopify relies too heavily on a few, large merchants that use its premium services. Most of the company's customers, over 820,000 as of June, are smaller and tend to flame out on a regular basis, creating considerable churn.

That's where the fulfillment service comes in. The company has pledged to negotiate low rates with warehouses and shipping companies, then pass those savings on to its customers. In the future, Shopify could pool shipments from different merchants, making shipping faster and cheaper and gaining some of the same advantages Amazon gets from its centralized fulfillment network.

It's partnered with logistics firms to offer the service to merchants shipping orders of 10 to 10,000 items in seven US warehouses in the initial phase.

“Right now it is really important that we invest in the right growth opportunities for the future and not necessarily take our foot off the gas,” says Harley Finkelstein, Shopify's chief operating officer.

Many merchants prefer using Shopify because they can create a brand on their own website, rather than being subsumed into an Amazon-style marketplace. The new fulfillment service will also let them slap their brand on the shipping cartons, something some fulfillment companies don't offer.

Kostick, who also sells his products on Amazon and uses its fulfillment network says the U.S. company provides access to one of the fastest-growing distribution channels for beauty products in the U.S., but Shopify offers more control.

“You can customize your own website however you want,” he says. “Basically, you're empowered.”

Jennifer Harper, who also sells sustainable cosmetics through Shopify, says she will wait until Shopify sorts out any kinks before trying the fulfillment service. Others say it could be difficult and expensive to get out of existing contracts with stand-alone services in the short term.

Shopify says it could eventually build its own warehouses. While Shopify's finance chief, Amy Shaperon, has said that the company will be able to offset the cost with fees for the new service, some analysts say revenue will be limited at first because Shopify will need to offer discounts to lure merchants.

Amazon may have little to fear from Canada's most valuable tech company at this point. Still, Shopify offers a serious alternative to the U.S. leviathan.

“Amazon is all about trying to satisfy the customer,” says Anurag Rana, a senior analyst at Bloomberg Intelligence. “They do whatever they can in their power to squeeze money out of the merchants to give it to customers. Shopify is the exact opposite. They will do whatever it takes to help the merchant and maximize their profit.”

ing is really important for our members,” Covey said. “We want to take some of the stress out of the experience.”

Delta Air Lines has a similar partnership and uses Clear to let members enter its Delta Sky Club lounges with a fingerprint check.

Privacy advocates have raised concerns about the use of biometric data and the ability to keep it secure. Illinois law requires companies collecting information such as facial, fingerprint and iris scans to first obtain consumers' consent and provide details on how they'll use the data and how long the records will be kept.

Clear said Illinois' regulations have not posed challenges to bringing its service to the state and is committed to complying.

“We employ best-in-class security measures, and continuously monitor, audit and test our platform so that we understand potential threats before they can become an issue,” Clear spokesman Adam Grossberg said in an email.

Clear said its service is offered in more than 60 U.S. airports, stadiums and other locations, though it isn't currently offered anywhere in Illinois.

phasize some of our strengths, particularly around patient safety.”

NorthShore also moved up the list this year under the new methodology. Last year, it ranked seventh in the state. NorthShore includes hospitals in Evanston, Skokie, Glenview and Highland Park.

NorthShore President and CEO J.P. Gallagher called it “an affirmation of a journey that we've actually been on for several years.”

The new methodology placed more emphasis on patient feedback, which is an area of strength for the hospital system, Gallagher said. Hospitals serving large numbers of older people also tended to do better under the new methodology, said Ben Harder, chief of health analysis for U.S. News. NorthShore has a “sizable” older patient population, Gallagher said.

U.S. News also ranks hospitals in 16 specialties, including cancer, cardiology and heart surgery, geriatrics and gynecology.

The Shirley Ryan Ability-Lab in Streeterville again ranked as the No. 1 hospital for rehabilitation in the country — the 29th consecutive time it's topped the list.

U.S. News' Harder said he hopes consumers look beyond the overall top 20 hospitals in the country and drill deeper, to discover which hospitals are best in specific areas of care.

“It's not just about which hospital's in the top 20 because most patients don't need care from an honor roll hospital,” Harder said. “It's really about what care do they need and which hospitals perform well in that particular type of care.”

experience was not helping.”

With the new brand, Cresco is consolidating 11 dispensary brands it operates around the country, many of which it acquired. For instance, its five Illinois dispensaries currently operate under four different names — Med-Mar, PDI Medical, FloraMedex and Phoenix Botanical.

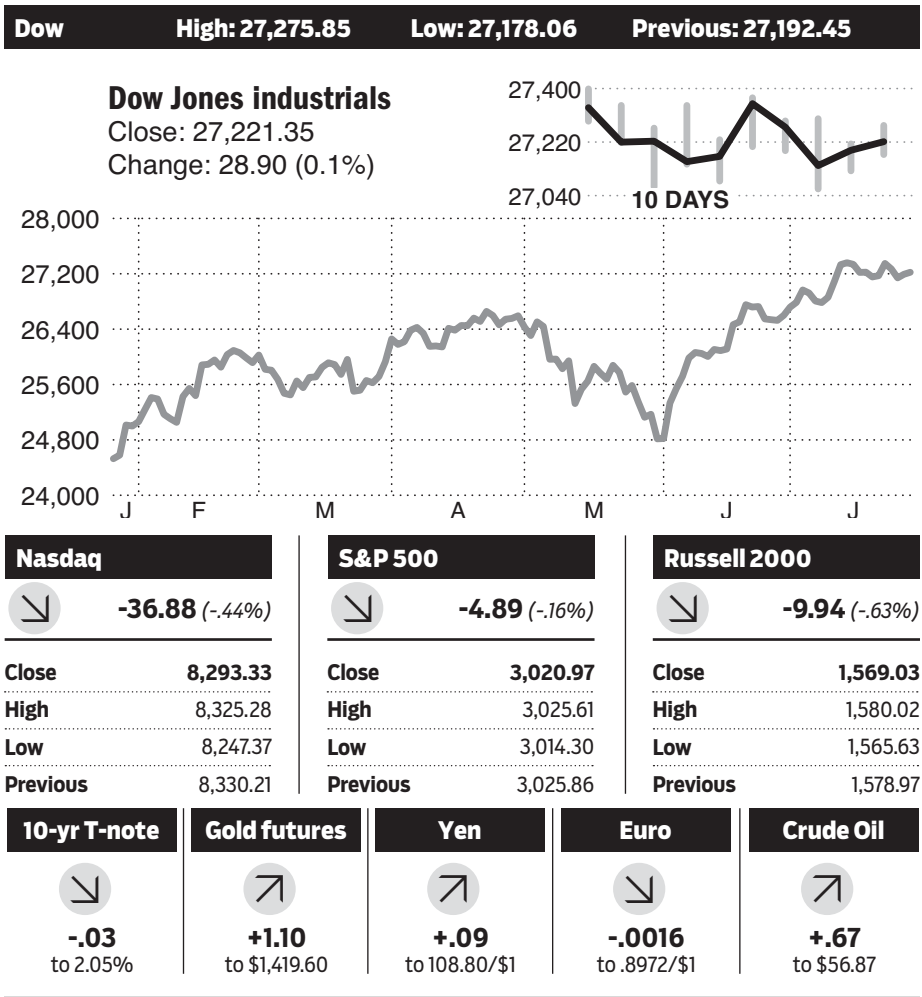

The first Sunnyside location is set to open in Philadelphia in November. Besides Illinois, future locations are planned for New York, Florida, Ohio, Arizona, Massachusetts and Michigan.

Other Illinois dispensaries are preparing for recreational sales as well, searching for locations to open a second site, staffing up and getting ready for increased foot traffic. They are looking at technology that can add efficiency, like the software restaurants use to text diners when their table is ready, and systems that let customers preorder their marijuana.

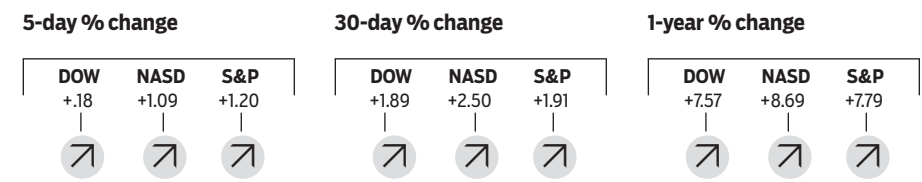

But there are still barriers. Many municipalities, which can decide to ban cannabis businesses, have not yet made decisions on where dispensaries can be located. That includes Chicago.

Teenagers are setting their Instagram accounts as “business profiles” to get more followers, but doing so may put their privacy at risk as well, says a data scientist.

Instagram’s ‘business’ profiles may endanger teens’ privacy

Some app settings can boost followers, reveal personal info

By SARAH FRIER
Bloomberg News

Millions of young people are turning their personal Instagram accounts into “business” profiles to achieve higher followings. The trend has an unintended privacy consequence.

In order to be classified as a business on Facebook’s Instagram, users agree to provide their phone number or email to the public on the app. Their choice — made much easier by Instagram’s design and prompting — can endanger their privacy and that of their friends, according to David Stier, an independent data scientist who reported the issue to the company, and conducted a broad analysis on 200,000 accounts around the world with several different sampling techniques.

“I’ll talk to parents and say, ‘Did you know that if your 13-year-old turns their Instagram account into a business account, more than 1 billion people have access to their contact information?’” Stier said.

“Every parent I talk to is like, ‘Are you kidding?’”

Many social media sites, including Instagram, set the minimum age at 13, a rule that many teens and even younger kids regularly flout to sign up.

In Instagram’s settings, a certain option asks if they’re a “creator” or a “business.” After they say what kind of user they are, they’ll be asked what contact information they want to display. Then they’re rewarded with a host of charts about how they’re performing on Instagram, including what days and times people view their posts, which ones were the most popular and how often and by what gender their profile is seen.

Stier verified people’s ages through information displayed in users’ bios or profiles. He said he has seen teens say they’re a “nonprofit” or an “athlete.” But upon reviewing their profiles, he found that a significant portion of them were not businesses, but regular people, sometimes with mere hundreds of followers.

After he reported the issue to Facebook, Instagram made the contact information less obviously visible. But the company said they didn’t consider his findings a security vulnerability because users made their own choices about what information to display, according to an email exchange reviewed by Bloomberg.

Instagram didn’t reply to a request for comment.

Stier argued that despite that choice, Instagram could protect users’ privacy. It’s possible to email and call people without displaying their actual personal details. Many businesses use contact forms, for example, or anonymized emails. Instagram could do the same for minors, he said.

When people sign up to get Instagram’s tools for businesses, the company doesn’t verify that they are who they say they are. Instagram has blurred the lines between personal and professional, because so many regular people use their profiles for economic purposes, to create a brand for their art or photography.

For the most part, users seek Instagram followings for the social currency they provide, creating something of a digital popularity contest. Instagram executives have proposed partially solving it by removing “like” counts on posts.

OBITUARIES

JOAN KERWIN 1932-2019

Pioneering pilot helped found Illinois Aviation Hall of Fame

BY BOB GOLDSBOROUGH

Joan Kerwin was a pioneering female aviator in Illinois who helped found the Illinois Aviation Hall of Fame and was active in numerous other aviation societies.

Kerwin, who was inducted into the Illinois Aviation Hall of Fame in 2002, also was part of the Ninety-Nines, an international organization of female pilots, said past Ninety-Nines international President Pat Prentiss.

"During my tenure as president, Joan was very supportive and frequently accompanied me on trips to other countries," Prentiss said. "Joan had a way with people, which made her a good ambassador for the Ninety-Nines."

Kerwin, 87, died after a brief respiratory illness on June 15 at her Wheaton home, said her son, Peter.

Born Joan Angela Setina in Joliet, Kerwin graduated from Joliet Township High School in 1950. Her first job after high school was as a secretary at a Caterpillar plant in Joliet, her son said.

Eager to work in aviation — and imbued with a keen desire to fly airplanes, Kerwin took a job as a flight attendant for United Airlines in the 1950s. She was forced to leave that job when she got married, as a policy at that time barred married female flight attendants.

Kerwin took an introductory flight class in the late 1960s.

"(My husband) said I could do it so long as I came home from flight school in time for the kids to come home from school for lunch," Kerwin told the Wheaton Journal newspaper in August 1992. "So I took my classes in the mornings out at DuPage County Airport."

After gaining her private pilot's license in 1969, Kerwin joined the Ninety-Nines — also known as the 99s — later serving on the board of directors of the group, which was formed in 1929 under the leadership of aviator Amelia Earhart.

"Joan was very involved with the structure of the 99s and (its) governing documents," Prentiss said. "She served on committees that protected the interest of the members."

Kerwin enjoyed flying around the country. Her family purchased a brand-new Cessna 172 airplane in 1975, her son said, and she only sold it a year and a half ago, he said.

Kerwin flew in two Powder Puff Derbies, which were transcontinental air derbies overseen and piloted by female aviators. One of those was the final Powder Puff Derby in 1977, in which Kerwin was one of 200 women participating.

Through her involvement with the Ninety-Nines, Kerwin began working to create the Illinois Aviation Hall of Fame, and she eventually served as the treasurer of the group. While the Hall of Fame has no physical presence, it does induct new members each year at a banquet in Peoria.

"The key is that the contribution (to aviation) must have taken place inside the state," Kerwin told the Wheaton Journal in 1992. "The accomplishment can be promotional, educational or even record-breaking."

Kerwin herself was inducted into the Hall of Fame in 2002.

Charles Rodriguez, the Hall of Fame's current president, said Kerwin "had a sterling reputation for loving aviation."

"Joan was kind of like the matriarch of the (Hall of Fame)," he said. "Even though she was in declining health for the past year or so, she still made the meetings and the banquets. I tell you what, she was nothing short of a dynamo."

After 45 years of service, Kerwin stepped down from the Illinois Aviation Hall of Fame board this past spring.

Kerwin's many other aviation-related activities included presenting flight safety seminars in the 1970s and '80s, flying orientation flights for Chicago Board of Education members as a way to persuade them to offer aviation classes in the public schools, and creating an exhibit at Chicago's Museum of Science and Industry in 1983 that featured women in aviation.

While in her 50s, Kerwin returned to school, earning a bachelor's degree in political science from Northern Illinois University in 1987 and also attending law school at NIU for a year.

Kerwin's husband of 37 years, Walter, died in 1994. In addition to her son, she is survived by a daughter, Amy Beesley; another son, Walter; and three grandchildren.

Services were held.

Trubisky zings a throw to dream on

Bears hope 50-yarder in rain, wind a preview of deep passing game

By Rich Campbell

BOURBONNAIS — The Bears practiced in pads Monday for the second straight day, and coach Matt Nagy had hoped the offense would rebound after the defense clearly had the upper hand Sunday.

Instead, steady rain, wind and intermittent downpours were problematic for throwing and catching — which made quarterback Mitch Trubisky's biggest play of camp even more impressive.

Trubisky's 50-yard completion to Taylor Gabriel was the type of flash the Bears want to see more consistently. Gabriel ran deep down the left seam, and Trubisky recognized it. His deep ball didn't quite cut cleanly through the rain and wind, but there was enough on the throw to keep it out in front of Gabriel and away from Kyle Fuller, who was trailing.

Gabriel adjusted to the inside and made a lunging catch — the type of play he showed last year against the Dolphins and Vikings that he can provide the offense. Of course, Trubisky had to do his part by identifying the opportunity and delivering the throw.

"Sometimes it's just taking what the defense gives you," Trubisky said, "and we've got to keep those corners honest, just taking some shots downfield, staying aggressive. That was a good look where Taylor ran a great route. He got behind the corner, and I put it in a good spot

"I COULD FEEL IT ALL OVER MY WHOLE BODY WHEN I SAW A SCOUT FROM THE CUBS COMING UP TO ME AND TELLING ME THAT, 'HEY, WE'VE BEEN WATCHING YOU PLAY. WE'RE REALLY IMPRESSED. WE WANT TO GIVE YOU THIS OPPORTUNITY? I WAS JUST OVER THE MOON.'" — Robel Garcia

WORLD CLASS

Not even a cardboard glove and a roster snub could derail Robel Garcia's remarkable journey from the Dominican Republic to Italy to the Cubs

By Phil Thompson

Robel Garcia is the Cinderella story that almost didn't happen. ¶ If his comeback story already seems far-fetched — flamed out in the minors, latched on with the Italian national team despite being a native of the Dominican Republic, made an accidental audition for the Cubs and staged a meteoric rise to the majors — consider these two things: ¶ 1. The Cubs scout who saw Garcia play for Team Italy in Arizona last fall almost decided against telling his bosses, thinking they might laugh at him. ¶ 2. Garcia wasn't even supposed to be in Arizona in the first place. He nearly had been left behind in Italy. ¶ But more on that nearly missed connection later. First, there's the matter of the close call with the Cubs.

"His age (25 at the time) was totally against him, so I was almost at a point where I wasn't even going to mention it," said Cubs area scout Gabe Zappin, who was checking out the Reds' instructional league game in Arizona against Team Italy on Oct. 4, 2018, when one of Italy's infielders caught his attention. "I just felt like I'm going to make that phone call and (they will) be like, 'Hey, man, this kid's 25 years old and he's been out of the country for five years.' Like, 'Why are you calling?'"

But Garcia made a strong impression.

"I mean it was within a half-hour, this kid makes a big-league play (on defense), then turns around a 97 mph fastball and hits it into the desert," Zappin said. "I was just like,

"How do I not say something?"

So he made the call.

In 54 at-bats over 18 games with the Cubs, Garcia has 13 hits — eight of them for extra bases, including four home runs — and a .241/.276/.574 slash line.

"When I came to the instructional league, I told myself this is my chance, this is my opportunity, I need to make the best of it," Garcia said through Cubs interpreter Johnny Acevedo.

Garcia, whose full name is Robel Estiwal Garcia Rodriguez, was born in Las Matas de Farfan, the birthplace of many major-leaguers, including Juan Encarnacion, Odalis Perez and former Cubs pitcher Roberto Novoa.

"In Las Matas de Faran, baseball was a way of life," Garcia

ST. LOUIS — The Cubs, Cardinals and Brewers were engaged in a three-way race for the National League Central title in mid-August 2007, but none of the three teams was taking charge.

"It seems like we're in a pennant race," manager Lou Piniella said. "But I'm not too damn sure."

What goes around comes around, and once again the Cubs, Cardinals and Brewers find themselves in a steel cage match with two months left and little room for error. None of the three is dominant, and each has a hole it could fill before Wednesday's trade deadline.

After overcoming a pair of bullpen blowups with a win Sunday in Milwaukee, the Cubs return to St. Louis in a first-place tie with the Cardinals.

TOP OF THE SECOND

DAVID HAUGH

Zobrist not saving the season

Nobody appreciates a persuasive baseball narrative more than those who write them.

Hope leads to hype and we allow ourselves to ponder every best-case scenario. Take it from somebody who last summer practically penned a ballad for Cubs infielder David Bote — from struggling Class A infielder sleeping in a friend’s basement to major-league millionaire — and once predicted a “Junior Lake effect” for the Cubs after the outfielder’s flash-in-the-pan 2013 debut.

It can be fun to get lost in sports sagas that stir us, a harmless tendency that came to mind the other day after the Cubs announced Ben Zobrist plans to return by Sept. 1.

I immediately felt happy for Zobrist, a good guy struggling publicly with the private matter of divorce. Just as quickly, I thought, “Whoa,” to anybody expecting much this year from “Zo.” Slow down, Chicago.

Yes, Zobrist’s niche in Cubs lore makes it an irresistible storyline: The likable 2016 World Series MVP, whose clubhouse presence and professional bat has been missed since taking a leave of absence May 6, triumphantly returns for the pennant race. The Wrigley Field fans cheer, the hits come, the “W” flag flies.

Zobrist offers the Cubs a veteran who is as versatile as he is valuable. Nobody in a Cubs uniform commands any more respect.

If only being universally respected guaranteed results.

Alas, the calendar doesn’t care. Zobrist turned 38 since his last game as Cub almost three months ago. Nothing suggests a player that age returning after such a long layoff would be anything but rusty and sore, even one as maniacally focused as Zobrist.

Nothing about Zobrist’s imminent return to the lineup says immediate solution. Nothing screams savior.

Realistically, a subtle but significant difference exists between what the Cubs lost in Zobrist’s absence and what they likely would gain from his return. Nobody denies that the Cubs offense without Zobrist all summer contributed to a rotating door at second base — where several replacements have collectively floundered — and a gaping hole in the leadoff spot, where the on-base percentage hovers below .300. His void also complicated the Cubs’

JOHN J. KIM/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

But to think a player near the end of his career can go four months between major-league fastballs and still hit one like he was 28 instead of 38 stretches the bounds of baseball logic. The Cubs would benefit greatly from Zobrist’s character and daily approach in the clubhouse. In terms of tangibles, the guy who departed hitting .241 in 83 at-bats figures to have minimal impact on a feast-or-famine offense that struggles to manufacture runs. Cole Hamels returning to the rotation means more in the context of the NL Central race.

How is Zobrist’s bat speed and timing? Where is his head after dealing with family turmoil? When it comes to Zobrist and baseball, the questions outnumber the answers. The Cubs can count on little other than Zobrist being a consummate professional and teammate.

It would be a bonus if Zobrist evolves into the trusted pinch hitter the Cubs never replaced after Tommy La Stella was traded. Anybody anticipating more than that from Zobrist risks setting himself up for disappointment. Expect little. That’s safe but smart.

Rest assured Cubs President Theo Epstein realizes this and considers Zobrist’s status unrelated to potential trades before Wednesday’s deadline. Epstein’s update on Zobrist unfortunately got caught in the same news cycle as speculation over the Cubs’ pursuit of a proven bat, which they still need. That’s a more important headline yet to be written.

When it comes to baseball, Epstein remains more pragmatic than romantic. The man whose grandfather Philip Epstein wrote “Casablanca” enjoys a good Hollywood ending too. But Epstein authored a Cooperstown resume by listening to his head over his heart. His big decisions figure to reflect minimal expectations from Zobrist in September.

Not having Zobrist had nothing to do with the Cubs blowing eight saves in July — tied for most in the majors. Not having Zobrist had nothing to do with the Cubs losing four games on the current road trip that they either led or were tied after eight innings. Not having Zobrist had nothing to do with Pedro Strop blowing six saves this season or the bullpen becoming the team’s biggest liability.

Epstein’s edicts before the trade deadline appear simple:

Fix a bullpen that’s unfairly turning hit lefties or bat at the top of the order — preferably both — to fill a need the front office neglected last winter.

And please stop mentioning financial flexibility as an impediment to a deal that could make the Cubs more legitimate contenders.

Moore suffers setback, won’t coach for Badgers

Wisconsin assistant men’s basketball coach Howard Moore will not return to his position this season after suffering a setback from the car accident that killed his wife and daughter in May, the school announced Monday.

Moore, 48, a Chicago native and former head coach at UIC, is recovering in a long-term care facility after recently suffering a medical issue at his home in Madison, Wis. He went into cardiac arrest during an ambulance ride to the hospital, according to the news release.

Moore sustained third-degree burns in the May 25 crash near Ann Arbor, Mich., in which a wrong-way driver struck his family’s vehicle head on, according to Michigan state police.

Moore starred in basketball at Taft and played for Wisconsin from 1990-95.

BASEBALL

Potential pivot points in crucial series

By Mark Gonzales

Here are three things to watch for in the Cubs-Cardinals series that starts Tuesday night at Busch Stadium:

1. Can the Cubs contain Paul Goldschmidt?

Goldschmidt is batting .235 with only two extra-base hits in 34 at-bats against the Cubs this season. But the Cubs know better. In 43 career games against them while playing for the Diamondbacks, Goldschmidt batted .353 with 14 home runs, 39 RBIs, a .471 on-base percentage and a 1.170 OPS. At Wrigley Field, he had a .337 batting average with five home runs, 17 RBIs and a 1.011 OPS entering 2019. Goldschmidt has helped the Cardinals move into a share of first place, homering in six consecutive games and driving in 13 runs until he was held without a homer in a loss Sunday to the Astros. Goldschmidt is capable of carrying the Cardinals to the division title, so the Cubs must find a way to harness him.

2. Beware of Adam Wainwright.

Just when it looks like he's finished, Wainwright, 37, seems to rise to the occasion. He threw one of the most impressive games of the 2019 season when he pitched eight shutout innings against the Cubs in a 126-pitch performance June 2 at Busch Stadium. Wainwright walked seven but also fed off the aggressiveness of Cubs batters by striking out eight with his signature curve and by elevating his fastball that barely exceeded 90 mph. He will open the series for the Cardinals at home, where he's 5-2 with a 2.33 ERA in nine starts, compared with 2-5 and 7.16 in 10 road starts.

ELAINE THOMPSON/AP

Adam Wainwright pitched eight shutout innings against the Cubs on June 2.

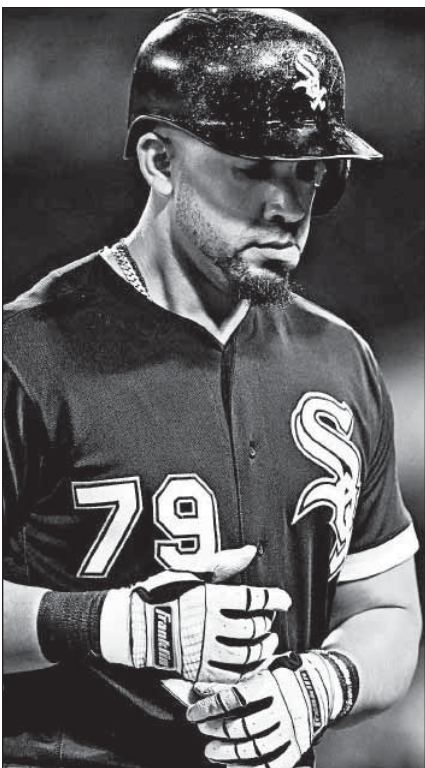

3. Can the Cubs win a road series?

The Cubs haven't won a road series since taking two of three against the Nationals on May 17-19. The Cardinals swept them in a three-game series at Busch on May 31-June 2. Two of the losses were by a 2-1 score. If the Cubs are to put some distance between themselves and the rest of the NL Central, they must take care of business on the road against division foes. They also can't leave themselves vulnerable to late-inning collapses as they did last weekend in Milwaukee and during the earlier series in St. Louis. By the way, the Cubs finish the regular season in St. Louis, so plenty could be at stake then too.

SCOTT KANE/AP

The Cubs and Victor Caratini have two more series in St. Louis this season.

CHRIS SWEDA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Jose Abreu, walking back to the dugout against the Marlins last week, finally got some rest after playing in every game.

WHITE SOX

After playing all 102 games, 'tired' Abreu gets a respite

By Lamond Pope

Jose Abreu doesn't like having a day off. In fact, Abreu's mother doesn't like it either. Abreu played in the first 102 games this season, becoming the first White Sox player to do so since Alexei Ramirez in 2013. The first baseman/designated hitter finally got a day of rest Sunday. The Sox sat Abreu and fellow All-Star James McCann in the 11-1 loss to the Twins. With a day off built into the schedule Monday, manager Rick Renteria looked at Sunday as an opportunity to give the two an extended break. It's a strategy he's used before. Yoan Moncada sat June 14 against the Indians ahead of a scheduled day off. Abreu leads the team with 22 home runs and 72 RBIs. But he went 4-for-22 (.182 average) with a double, one homer and three RBIs in the first six games of the current homestand. "As we were watching this whole week unfold, you can see he's tired," Renteria said before Sunday's game. "And (persuading him to take a day off) was not as hard as you might think. He comes into my office every night kind of yelling at me, and so (Saturday) he was coming in and I said: 'You're not going to convince me. You're not getting in the lineup, so don't say a thing.' "So he said he was going to have to call his mom (Sunday) to make sure she doesn't get too upset because she sees him as a grinder and he's got to get out there. And he talks to her, and she's probably going to be upset he's not in the lineup. So I said: 'That's OK. If you need me to, I'll talk to her.' " Abreu has played at least 154 games in three of his first five seasons, including a career-high 159 in 2016. He played 145 games during his AL Rookie of the Year season in 2014 and a career-low 128 last season because of two injuries in the second half. McCann has appeared in 76 games. He's hitting .283 with 12 homers and 33 RBIs. But he's batting .135 (7-for-52) in the second half. One of the hits was the two-out solo homer in the ninth to tie the July 20 game against the Rays at Tropicana Field. The Sox won that game 2-1 in 11 innings, with Abreu driving in the go-ahead run with a single that scored Moncada from first base. McCann is 3-for-20 (.150) with a homer and one RBI during the homestand. While McCann will continue to do the bulk of the catching, Renteria is looking for opportunities to use Welington Castillo. "Fortunately for us with (Sunday) and (Monday), the natural day off worked out for both (McCann) and (Abreu)," Renteria said. "I'm going to try to get (Castillo) to take a couple of the (starting pitchers) and then we'll rotate. We'll have (day games after night games) where some adjustments will have to be made. And (McCann has) been another guy I've been running out there a lot, whether it's been catching or DH'ing. "(McCann) needs a break. He's really pushed himself, he's been a big part of who we are through the first half and even now catching a lot of these guys. Very important for him and (Castillo) to start splitting a little bit of the time. I want Mac to take most of the time with these guys, but we're going to continue to make some adjustments and let him be who he is."

After criticizing St. Louis as "boring," Kris Bryant was loudly booed by Cardinals fans during the Cubs' last appearance at Busch Stadium.

Breaking up cluster

St. Louis boos

Flashback: Kris Bryant refers to St. Louis as "boring" in an offhand comment during Ryan Dempster's talk show at the Cubs Convention in January 2019, then gets loudly booed during every plate appearance in the Cubs' first trip to Busch Stadium on May 31-June 2. Bryant goes 2-for-13 as the Cardinals sweep the Cubs. Fast forward: Bryant has hit .338 with a 1.011 OPS over his last 37 games since June 13, helping carry the offensive load for the up-and-down Cubs. Will Cardinals fans ever forgive him? Lighting a fire Flashback: Cubs manager Joe Maddon asks who "put out the hit" on Anthony Rizzo after the first baseman gets plunked during a heated game in September 2015. "I don't know if Tony Soprano is in the dugout," Maddon says of the Cardinals staff. "I didn't see him in there. We're not going to put up with that from them or anyone else." The Cubs go on to win a wild-card spot and beat the Cardinals in the National League Division Series. Fast forward: Maddon went ballistic July 4 in Pittsburgh, accusing Pirates pitchers of throwing at Javier Baez and getting restrained from going to the Pirates dugout to speak his mind to manager Clint Hurdle. "They just need to be careful," Maddon said, adding: "They're good guys ... but if they keep pitching like that, a lot of these guys are not going to like their pitching staff." Fired up by Maddon's ejection, the Cubs won nine of their next 11 games. But they're 2-5 since. Power play Flashback: Kyle Schwarber homers onto the top of the right-field video board at Wrigley Field in the clinching Game 4 of the 2015 NLDS. The Cubs put the ball in a Plexiglas case and leave it on the board, adding to the legend of the "Schwarbomb." Fast forward: Schwarber is closing out a tough July, hitting .203 for the month. But his two-homer, seven-RBI afternoon Sunday against the Brewers boosted his season numbers to 24 homers and 54 RBIs. That struggling potential makes Schwarber the best trading chip Cubs President Theo Epstein has if he decides to make a splash at the trade deadline. Friend to foe Flashback: Maddon gives leadoff man Dexter Fowler a T-shirt-ready motto at the start of the 2015 season, telling him before every at-bat: "You go, we go." Fast forward: Fowler signed a five-year, $82.5 million deal with the Cardinals after helping the Cubs win the 2016 World Series title. He's hitting .236 with a .334 on-base percentage in 303 games with the Cardinals. But if they win the division and Fowler helps prevent the Cubs from reaching the postseason, his new motto could be "You go, Joe goes." For Pete's sake Flashback: Pedro Strop points skyward after being removed following a poor outing in St. Louis in June 2015. MLB Network broadcaster Bob Costas sends his disapproval, wondering aloud if Strop was asking "some departed relative for forgiveness for this atrocious performance." Costas later apologized and buried the hatchet with Strop. Fast forward: Strop lost his eighth-inning role last weekend in Milwaukee after the latest in a series of July implosions, while Costas' name has been floated for a possible hosting role next year on the Cubs' new TV network. Pack mentality Flashback: The Cardinals sweep the Cubs at Busch in the aforementioned May 31-June 2 series, leaving the Cubs 2-8 over their last 10 games. Maddon, naturally, is undeterred: "Nobody is running away with anything. It's going to be a cluster the entire time." Fast forward: The Cubs are back in town, and it's still a cluster.

Cubs second baseman Robel Garcia points to the sky in celebration of his fourth-inning doubles July 14 against the Pirates at Wrigley Field.

said. “I would always go to the stadium with my uncle. ... He was never able to sign with a major-league team, but I was always at his hip every time we would go to the stadium.”

Garcia, who had a lot of support from his dad, started playing when he was 8. His parents couldn’t afford a baseball glove, so he made his own.

“Growing up there, especially around that time, it was really difficult to find spikes, to find good gloves, and it wasn’t until I was 12 that I found my first pair of spikes and my first glove,” he said. “My very first glove was actually made out of (cardboard) when I was like 7 or 8 years old.”

Garcia used it to catch tennis balls — which kids used instead of baseballs. “I was actually pretty good at it,” he said about fielding with a cardboard glove. “When you’re a kid, you just learn how to stop everything, so I just figured it out.”

At 14, Garcia moved to Santo Domingo to attend a baseball academy and attracted the interest of international scouts.

Ramon Pena, then the Indians’ chief Latin American scout, signed Garcia at 16 in 2010.

There were high hopes for Garcia in Cleveland. But over four seasons in the Indians minor-league system, it was a slow march to nowhere.

Garcia struck out a lot — 30% of his 1,201 minor-league at-bats — and never made it above Class A.

“It was kind of a slower process,” Garcia said. “I didn’t develop as a ballplayer as fast as I or the organization would have wished.”

The transition overwhelms many young players from Latin American countries, said Jimmy Gonzalez, who managed Garcia with the Tennessee Smokies, the Cubs’ Double-A affiliate.

“Sometimes they fail on the field because they miss their home, their parents, they feel like aliens, and they don’t understand what’s being said,” Gonzalez said.

By 2014, Garcia had run out of chances with Indians brass, and the Class A Mahoning Valley Scrappers released him on March 28.

“It was a very difficult time,” Garcia said. “I had just gotten released on my birthday, but it’s part of the game and I had to accept it and keep moving forward.”

He moved to Verona in 2016 to be with his wife, Daniela Perez, and two children. Perez was born in the Dominican Republic but moved to Italy with her family as a baby. Garcia met her through his sister, whose husband is his wife’s brother.

“There weren’t a lot of opportunities in Santo Domingo to develop my baseball skills,” Garcia said. “Secondly, my wife and my kids were in Italy. That made that decision fairly easier for me.”

In June 2016, he signed with Italy’s independent-league Imola Redskins, then played for Fortitudo Bologna the next year. He helped Bologna win the 2018 Italian Baseball League championship.

When current Team Italy manager Gilberto “Gibo” Gerali first saw Garcia taking batting practice with Bologna, he had no idea who Garcia was.

“The ball was exploding off his bat, incredible bat speed, and I thought he must have been a new import player for them,” he said via email.

He later invited Garcia to join the national team.

“I had him play third base, short and at the Super 6 (tournament) in Holland, I found out he could play the outfield too,” Gerali said. “He is a smart kid and has a quality: He listens to everybody.”

Garcia has dual citizenship in Italy and the Dominican Republic.

When it came time to select the roster Team Italy would send to Arizona for a series of games against instructional league teams, “I chose mostly young players and Robel wasn’t among them,” Gerali said.

But during a Super 6 game, one of the players destined for Arizona broke his wrist sliding into second base, and that opened the door for Garcia.

“I had to play my way onto that roster,” Garcia said. “When I got here (in the U.S.) I had to have the same mindset, to keep working as hard as I have, if not harder, to get to where I am now, because of how hard I had to fight to get on that roster to get the invite to the instructional league.”

During Italy’s series in Arizona, after Zappin first spotted him, Garcia kept playing well in front of scouts. Cubs assistant director of pro scouting Andrew Bassett offered him a minor-league deal.

“I was just really emotional,” Garcia said. “I could feel it all over my whole body when I saw a scout from the Cubs coming up to me and telling me that, ‘Hey, we’ve been watching you play. We’re really impressed. We want to give you this opportunity.’ I was just over the moon.”

The Cubs signed him Oct. 31.

Gerali hoped scouts would notice Garcia and others from his team. “To be honest, I wasn’t sure Robel’s defense was good enough, but I thought his bat would overshadow the glove,” he said.

Garcia got to minor-league spring training and started raking homers and extra-base hits, the Smokies’ Gonzalez said.

“The joke was he might go to Triple A. No, no, no, I’ll take him at Double A,” Gonzalez said he pleaded to Cubs brass. Garcia was assigned to Tennessee on April 1.

It was clear from the day Garcia walked in the door that he had a professional’s polish about him, Gonzalez said. He sought out the team’s nutritionist and strength coach for extra advice and took on a leadership role with younger players, things prospects don’t typically do.

Gonzalez threw batting practice to Garcia every day and marveled at his determination. “It’s not just one thing but a bunch of things that would make (him) better. He wasn’t saying that; that’s what he was showing. Not everyone can have that mentality. Some just want to hit.”

During his first game with the Smokies on April 4, Garcia had a setback: a hamstring injury that sent him to the injured list. Gonzalez has seen players knocked off their stride when something like that happens.

“His IL stint passes — Game 1, home run,” Gonzalez said of Garcia’s return April 15.

In fact, Garcia hit six home runs in 78 at-bats for Tennessee and slashed .295/.391/.590. He had 23 hits in 22 games.

“He’s shown plate discipline, power from both sides of the plate, multiple positions, all of those things,” Gonzalez said.

Garcia said that during his time in Knoxville, he worked on laying off curves and changeups, knowing pitchers want to attack him with breaking balls.

He was promoted to Triple-A Iowa on May 8 and had a slightly longer run there, racking up 50 hits (25 for extra bases) in 50 games (178 at bats). He hit 15 homers and slashed .281/.352/.596.

With buzz building around Garcia, he got the call to Chicago on July 3 but arrived in Pittsburgh too late to do more than pinch-hit and strike out against the Pirates.

But in his next game on the Fourth of July, talk about fireworks.

He singled, tripled and homered, going 3-for-5 and falling a double shy of the cycle.

“What is going on?” thought Zappin, who received plenty of texts from fellow scouts that day.

After the game, Garcia told reporters, “I don’t have the words to describe how big it is, but it feels very good.”

Garcia’s longest home run came July 22 in San Francisco, where he hit a 454-footer into McCovey Cove.

Strikeouts have been an issue at every level. Garcia has 22 in his 54 major-league at-bats (40.7%). Does his free swinging concern former coaches such as Gonzalez?

“Not at all,” Gonzalez said. “Javy Baez did the exact same thing.”

Cubs manager Joe Maddon said proof of what Garcia can become will be evident once pitchers face him a second time and have a chance to figure out his weaknesses.

“It’s really tough for young players these days,” Maddon said. “Normally they have at least this break-in period where the other team doesn’t know them, but they know them from the very first minute now (because of video and analytics).”

“He has responded well, pretty quickly. I’m eager to watch how this continues.”

Garcia has found a steady role at second base, particularly after the team optioned Addison Russell to Iowa. Garcia also can play third and short and spent a couple of games for the Cubs in left field.

Gonzalez sees a future for him as a utility player.

There were moments, though, that Garcia couldn’t picture himself anywhere on a major-league field.

“Honestly, the process was really trying and difficult at times,” he said. “There were times when I was really down on myself, thinking, ‘Man, I’m not going to get this chance, I’m not going to get this opportunity.’ ... I just had to keep that focus and keep that attitude, and the heart that I have and the passion that I have for this game, in order to get where I am now.”

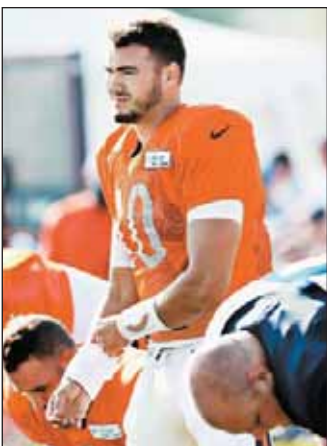

And after traveling all the way to Italy just to get back to American baseball, Garcia has no plans to go anywhere else anytime soon.

His wife and two kids, a boy and girl both under 5, go to all of his games at Wrigley Field. But it’s his son who’s most excited, caught up in Robelmania.

“When I hit my first home run, my wife recorded a video of him cheering me, saying, ‘Go Robel! Go Robel!’ So he’s loving it.”

where he could go make a play on it.”

One of Trubisky’s focuses this preseason is to nurture the connection with his receivers on deep throws. He led the NFL last season with six completions that traveled at least 50 yards in the air (one was a Hail Mary to Kevin White against the Patriots), but none resulted in a touchdown.

Within that juxtaposition, Trubisky sees the room to grow and make the offense more explosive down the field.

“It’s just continuing to develop the timing, figure out how much air I want to put on it, if I want to take a little off of it or get it on him quicker so he can run underneath it,” Trubisky said. “That was one of those situations where we connected, and everybody was on the same page doing their job. That’s how big plays happen.”

Trubisky’s long ball to Gabriel was the last throw in the first set of team drills. For the rest of practice, he battled the elements like everyone else.

In one-on-one drills between receivers and cornerbacks, Trubisky was off target on a throw to Javon Wims at the right sideline. Slot cornerback Buster Skrine opened his body and made a one-handed interception.

Later in seven-on-seven, Trubisky threw a downfield corner route to Wims through a really tight window. Safety Deon Bush ranged over and broke up the pass. Great throw, even better breakup.

The first-string defense kept the first offense out of the end zone in red-zone drills and stood up during 2-minute work. There were drops in the wet weather; Allen Robinson had two.

The Bears defense doesn’t need help, but the conditions tilted the field in their favor.

“We’ve got a lot of great players on that side of the ball, so they’re going to challenge us in every single drill, which is great,” Trubisky said. “Whether we’re doing red zone, 2-minute, every situation they’re going to present a different challenge.”

“They’ve thrown a bunch of good looks at us, and it’s great for us as an offense to see those. We’ve just got to react, anticipate what they’re showing us and then go off that and do our jobs.”

The weather also presented a different test for kicker Elliott Fry, who banged a 60-yarder Saturday on a sunny, 80-degree morning with a slight crosswind. Monday, his 48-yarder in the rain and directly into a 10 mph wind barely cleared the crossbar.

Fry was 8 for 10 on kicks between 33 and 51 yards. He missed wide left from 39 and missed from 51 when his plant foot slipped out from under him. He got back up and hit from 51 on the next snap.

“Next-play mentality and make the next one,” Nagy said. “I thought he did a good job.”

Injury report: Tight end Adam Shaheen (lower back) missed practice for the second straight day. “We’re being a little bit cautious,” Nagy said. “Coming out here with the weather and where he’s at, it didn’t make sense for him to be out there.” ... Safety HaHa Clinton-Dix (sprained knee) continues to rehabilitate during practices. Expect him to be re-evaluated during the day off Wednesday along with rookie receiver Riley Ridley (hamstring), who hasn’t practiced since Friday.

‘Peanut Punch’ helped turn cornerback into master of the takeaway

By WILL LARKIN

It’s difficult for a cornerback to dominate a game; when one is at his best, the ball rarely is thrown his way.

Charles Tillman found a unique way to do it. His “Peanut Punch” shifted many games’ momentum and made him a hero among Bears fans.

While most fumbles are forced when a defensive player’s helmet or shoulder pad pops the ball out of a carrier’s hands or a pass rusher slaps it from an unsuspecting quarterback, Tillman used his fist to jab the seemingly secure ball from a back or receiver. The move was tricky; if he missed the ball and hit the player, it could result in an unsportsmanlike-conduct penalty or ejection. If he missed both, it could make for a blooper-reel missed tackle.

Tillman always seemed to strike his target, though. The Peanut Punch helped him cause 42 fumbles in his 12 years with the Bears, including 10 in 2012. He retired with 44 career forced fumbles, tied for sixth since the statistic became official in 1991. The top five are all defensive linemen; Brian Dawkins’ 36 are the next most by a defensive back.

“I just had a knack for knowing when to shoot my punch,” Tillman said at the Bears100 Celebration Weekend in June. “And I got lucky. Forty-four times.”

That knack never was more apparent than on Nov. 4, 2012, in Nashville, Tenn., where he forced four fumbles in a 51-20 win over the Titans. His punches separated the ball from wide receiver Kenny Britt, running back Chris Johnson and tight ends Craig Stevens and Jared Cook. Stevens’ fumble rolled out of bounds; the Bears recovered the other three, two of which led to quick touchdowns.

“They didn’t know how to hold on to the football,” Tillman said at Bears100. “That’s how it happened. They didn’t hold on to it. I don’t know, man. (Defensive backs coach) Gill Byrd used to always say, ‘This ball is worth millions. Go get it!’ So I said, ‘Yeah. I’m going to get it.’”

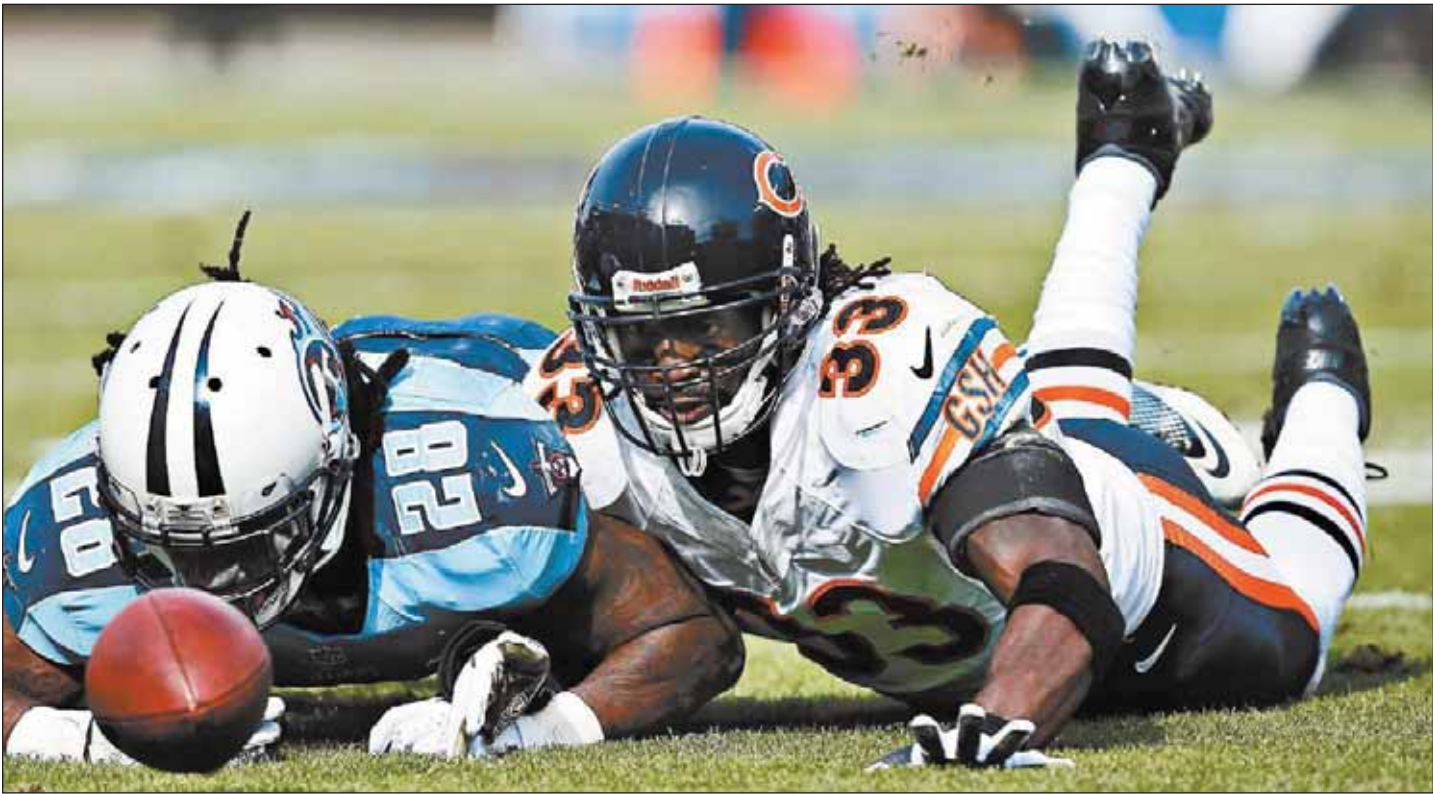

“I’m telling you right now, he’s getting Defensive Player of the Year,” Bears linebacker Lance Briggs told the Tribune’s Dan Pompei after that Titans game. “Hands down, there’s no one playing better than him. ... We’re all seeing history being made. I’ve never seen anybody do what he’s done and is able to do it so consistently.”

While Tillman’s punching prowess was well-known for years in Chicago, it became a national story after the Titans game as the rollicking Bears improved to 7-1. The Tribune’s Chris Kuc and Philip Hersh asked several boxers and mixed martial artists to grade Peanut’s pugilism.

“He’s got a good right hand,” light heavyweight Andrzej Fonfara said. “He’d make a good boxer. If he punched somebody in the chin with that punch, he’d be knocking out guys.”

The Bears finished 10-6 that season to miss the playoffs for the fifth time in six years, leading to the firing of coach Lovie Smith. For the previous nine years, Tillman was the perfect cornerback for Smith’s Cover-2 defense.

At 6-foot-2, 210 pounds, Tillman was strong enough to defend the run and athletic and intelligent enough to excel at man-to-man or zone coverage. He also was a key special teams contributor for most of his career for Bears units that were consistently among the league’s best.

Smith set a goal for his defense to lead the NFL in takeaways every year, and Tillman did his best to try to make it happen. In 2004, Smith’s first season with the Bears and Tillman’s second, the team ranked 16th in the NFL with 29 takeaways. In the next eight years, the Bears finished in the top 10 in the category seven times, in the top five four times and No. 1 with 44 forced turnovers in 2006 and 44 more in 2012.

Tillman caused more of those plays than any other Bear. In addition to his 42 forced fumbles, he had 36 interceptions — third in team history behind Gary Fencik’s 38 and Richie Petitbon’s 37 — and 11 fumble recoveries. The sum of those three stats, 89, is far more than any other Bear, with Fencik’s 63 the next most.

“I’m like everybody else,” Smith told the Tribune’s David Haugh after the Titans game. “I’m amazed too.”

Tillman credited Rodney Southern, his coach at Belton High School in Texas, with giving him the idea to punch the ball. Southern visited for a game when Tillman played at Louisiana-Lafayette.

“He told me, ‘You know, you could have forced a lot of balls out if you could just punch it,’ ” Tillman told Haugh. “Light bulb!”

“From that moment,” Haugh wrote, “dark days loomed for receivers who dared to carry the ball loosely against the cornerback who committed his career to popping it loose.”

The Bears selected Tillman in the second round with the 35th pick in the 2003 draft.

With their two first-round picks, they took quarterback Rex Grossman and defensive end Michael Haynes. In Tillman in the second round and Briggs in the third, the Bears found two players who would start for mostly excellent defenses for the next 12 years.

General manager Jerry Angelo and coach Dick Jauron envisioned Tillman as a player who could contribute as a No. 3 cornerback behind Jerry Azumah and R.W. McQuarters as a rookie before finding a bigger role. Tillman forced his way into the starting lineup by the fourth game, moving ahead of Azumah on the depth chart.

An up-and-down rookie season followed, as Tillman struggled at first in coverage and drew some costly pass-interference penalties. The Bears stuck with him, though, and it became apparent he could become a special player with more experience.

In the 14th game of that 7-9 season that resulted in Jauron’s firing, Tillman made perhaps the best play of his career. With the Bears leading 13-10 with a minute left against the Vikings, quarterback Daunte Culpepper lofted the ball toward 6-foot-4 superstar receiver Randy Moss in the end zone. Tillman leaped and reached over the head and shoulders of Moss and outfought him for the ball for a game-saving interception.

Defensive coordinator Greg Blache told the Tribune’s Fred Mitchell on Dec. 15, 2003: “For a young kid to go up and take the ball away from Randy Moss with the game on the line, it was huge. It speaks a lot to his athletic ability but also to his confidence.”

Later in his career, Tillman said he visualized making plays such as that interception and speaking them into existence.

“The tongue has the power of life or death,” Tillman told Haugh. “Say it, speak it, believe it.”

Tillman earned first-team All-Pro honors in 2012 and was voted into the Pro Bowl in 2011 and ’12. Now 38, he is still visible in the Chicago area. In 2018 he earned his FBI agent badge after training at the organization’s academy in Quantico, Va.

The Cornerstone Foundation, Tillman’s charity organization, helps critically ill children in the Chicago area. Tillman founded the organization in 2005 but changed its focus from education to aiding ailing children after his daughter Tiana’s life-saving heart transplant in 2009. He was named the Walter Payton Man of the Year by the NFL after the 2013 season.

“I’ve been around Charles my entire time here and he’s done so many good things,” Smith said when Tillman was named the winner of the Bears’ Ed Block Courage Award on April 7, 2009. “On a personal note, he’s gone through quite a bit. But you see the same Charles ... the sun is shining every day in his life, and we’re lucky to have him as part of our team.”

POSITION PREVIEW EDGE RUSHERS By DAN WIEDERER

As the Bears grind through training camp in Bourbonnais, the Tribune is taking a look at each position group.

Elite pass rushers Mack, Floyd will keep foes on edge

What to like

Khalil Mack is entering the second year of his nine-figure megadeal and is under contract through 2024. Theoretically, that means the Bears have one of their biggest defensive priorities taken care of for the next six years with one of the league’s top stars. And if Mack, who turned 28 in February, continues to produce at an elite level for even half that long, it will keep the Bears’ Super Bowl window pried open.

There’s no disputing how much Mack’s arrival catalyzed the Bears’ surprise breakthrough in 2018. The premier pass rusher forced two turnovers and scored a touchdown in his debut against the Packers. That immediate impact quickly energized and heightened the confidence of the entire defense, which went on to force a league-best 36 takeaways while allowing a league-low 177 points per game.

Mack finished his first season in Chicago with 12½ sacks and six forced fumbles, earning a first-team All-Pro nod as well as a flood of admiration from teammates.

“The man absolutely changed the face of our defense,” Danny Trevathan said. “We carried that momentum like, ‘Yeah, we’ve got some dawgs now. Let’s go!’ ”

If you wanted more good news, new outside linebackers coach Ted Monachino sees room for significant growth from Mack this season.

“The more he plays, the slower the game will become,” Monachino said. “And when the game becomes slower, now he’ll think in ways that he has never thought before. So it’s not simply the reaction and the attack mentality. He can do all that still but then think his way through it. And that’s huge.”

In one of their first meetings this spring,

Monachino asked Mack how high he wanted to set the bar for himself: “I made him tell me exactly how good he wanted to be.”

Mack didn’t hesitate to vocalize his desire to be the best outside linebacker ever to play. He continues to fuel that aspiration with his impressive drive and work habits. The belief throughout Halas Hall is that Mack’s sensational 2018 was simply the start of something spectacular.

Biggest question

Is this the year Leonard Floyd takes his biggest leap?

Floyd has Pro Bowl potential and can get there this season if he can sidestep the injury problems that have impeded his progress during his first three seasons. Last year, a fractured right hand suffered in a preseason game in Denver limited Floyd’s production through the first two months and renewed worries about his durability and long-term potential.

But once his hand was fully healed, his performance improved and he became a consistently disruptive force down the stretch, recording four sacks in his final seven games plus another in the playoff loss.

In May, the Bears exercised the fifth-year option on Floyd’s rookie contract, which will keep him a Bear through at least 2020. But if he turns in a big year, he may be in line for an eye-opening extension.

The Bears won’t measure Floyd’s 2019 success by sack totals alone, keeping tabs on how frequently his presence affects quarterbacks and how well he can stop the run. Monachino spent the spring marveling at Floyd’s length, speed, short-area quickness and coverage ability.

BRIAN CASSELLA/CHICAGO TRIBUNE

A big year could be in store for Bears outside linebacker Leonard Floyd, catching a ball tossed his way Sunday at camp.

Currently on roster: 8.
Projected on final roster: 4.
Roster locks: Khalil Mack, Leonard Floyd.
Good bets: Aaron Lynch.
On the bubble: Isaiah Irving, Kylie Fitts, Matt Betts.
Practice-squad candidates: Chuck Harris, James Vaughters.
Biggest offseason developments: The Bears hired Ted Monachino as senior defensive assistant and outside linebackers coach. ... Lynch was re-signed on a one-year deal with $1.25 million guaranteed.

Fresh face

Undrafted rookie Chuck Harris may be destined for the practice squad, but he’s considered a raw talent with intriguing athleticism as an edge rusher. What’s more, he played in college at Buffalo, striking up a relationship with Mack well before becoming a Bear. That mentor-protége bond will be fun to keep tabs on as Harris tries to carve out a niche for himself in the NFL.

You should know

The Bears would love to see Kylie Fitts or Isaiah Irving — or both — become dependable backups with the potential to produce when their opportunities come. Fitts, a sixth-round pick a year ago, shows flashes in practice with his instincts and get-off. Irving is well-rounded but needs to prove to a new defensive coaching staff he has at least one special attribute that gets him on the field more.

Quote of note

“If you asked me what non-rookie stood out in this offseason program, it would be Leonard Floyd. As he develops his pass rush and as he develops his counters working with Ted Monachino, working with Khalil Mack, I just feel like he’s getting better and better. That’s going to be exciting to see. Specifically with his pass rush, I feel like his repertoire and his toolbox has grown.” — Ryan Pace, Bears general manager

Big number

50 The Bears led the NFC with 50 sacks last season. Only the Chiefs and Steelers had more with 52 apiece. Of those 50, 20½ came from outside linebackers.

A cyclist rides in front of the Eiffel tower during the 21st and final stage of the 106th edition of the Tour de France cycling race on Sunday.

By Samuel Petrequin and John Leicester

“Now or Never.”

That was the headline running across the front page of France’s biggest-selling sports newspaper L’Equipe three weeks ago, amid nationwide hopes that a home-grown rider could finally win the Tour de France.

In the absence of many big names — including four-time champion Chris Froome — France’s top contenders Thibaut Pinot and Romain Bardet were expected to make the most of this year’s climb-heavy route, and even finally end the 34-year drought.

Three weeks later, neither Pinot nor Bardet stood on the Tour podium and the wait for a French winner continues.

The future of French cycling looks bright, though, and a successor to Bernard Hinault — the last Frenchman to win cycling’s marquee race back in 1985 — is likely to emerge sooner than later.

Although Bardet, twice a podium finisher, was never an overall threat and had to be content with the polka dot jersey for best climber, Pinot was magnificent until a left leg injury reduced him to tears on the side of an Alpine climb, and forced him out of the race within touching distance of the Champs Elysees.

With Bardet nowhere to be seen, another Frenchman, Julian Alaphilippe, surged to the fore, gaining pop-idol status in the space of just three weeks. And five French riders finished in the top 15 for the first time since 2011.

A classics specialist, Alaphilippe exceeded all expectations, wearing the yellow jersey for 14 days after playing havoc with traditional race strategies. Despite his pedigree in one-day races, Alaphilippe was not among the pre-Tour favorites, and many spectators had hardly heard of him when the race started.

But he took the Tour lead by storm during the first week of racing with a bold attack. After losing the yellow jersey, he reclaimed it and fought to stay in yellow with a living-the-moment humble attitude that excited fans and impressed his rivals.

“It’s incredible how he stepped up and improved,” said 2018 Tour champion Geraint Thomas, who finished runner-up this year behind his Ineos teammate Egan Bernal. “A big, big well done to him. He fought until the very end. He deserved to be on that podium.”

In scenes sometimes reminiscent of the “Wiggomania” in Britain when Bradley Wiggins won the 2012 Tour, Alaphilippe was feted in every village crossed by the peloton. Each morning, fans chanted his name near his team bus, asked him for selfies and stopped him for autographs. The excitement was such that at some point Alaphilippe had to be escorted by police officers to the start of the stage.

With his team not strong enough to protect him in the mountains, Alaphilippe worked alone in the Alps and ultimately paid for his exhausting efforts, cracking under the pressure of Ineos and Jumbo-Visma teams to drop to fifth place overall.

But Alaphilippe’s impressive victory in the individual time trial ahead of Thomas — a specialist in the race against the clock — combined with his natural flair and the bold attacks that helped him seize the limelight in the short and punchy climbs he loves so much, bode very well for the coming years.

“He should certainly have a go at the general classification when he’s ready,” Ineos manager Dave Brailsford, who has won seven of the last eight Tours with four different winners, told The Associated Press.

But Brailsford believes that Alaphilippe’s transformation into a potential Grand Tour winner would require a different approach to the Tour and a different style of racing, certainly less flamboyant.

“Fighting for the overall title is different mentally,” Brailsford said. “So he’s got to be ready for that. For now, he enjoys riding his bike. If he takes that flair and enthusiasm away, and gets really focused on the three weeks, rides in maybe a different way, that’s something that he ought to see three years down the line.”

Pinot’s situation is slightly different. A confirmed climber with a team capable of supporting him in the mountains, he arrived at the Tour in the form of his life after focusing on the Giro d’Italia last year.

Having spent weeks based in the Alps with all the big mountain stages in mind, Pinot showed from the start he would be a force to be reckoned with when he jumped on Alaphilippe’s wheel during the hilly Stage 8 to Saint-Etienne to gain time on Thomas and Bernal.

Pinot also showed a newly found mental fortitude later in the race, quickly bouncing back after the loss of 1 minute, 40 seconds in crosswinds. An emotional rider, Pinot responded with a display of class and power in the Pyrenees. In the southwestern mountain range, he stood out from the rest, even putting the pure climber Bernal on the back foot with devastating acceleration which earned him a prestige win at the Tourmalet summit.

But Pinot’s fragile health overtook his challenge. His Tour abruptly ended Friday in the arms of William Bonnet, the teammate who rode by his side in the last meters before his withdrawal, his left leg badly affected by a muscular injury sustained earlier in the final week.

A third-place finisher at the 2014 Tour, Pinot has not finished his home race since 2015. On Saturday morning, he still had to choke back tears when speaking to a TV crew about his withdrawal. But he has promised to come back in 2020.

“The confidence I have in Thibaut Pinot is enormous. He is a great rider and will remain a great rider,” FDJ-Groupama manager Marc Madiot said. “He always gets back on his feet, I believe the best is still to come.”

And maybe not just for Pinot.

“There are some really good French riders at the minute,” Brailsford said. “Obviously, the Bardet and Pinot generation. But underneath there is a new generation of young French riders coming through.”

Brailsford, who said a few years ago he would love to develop a French winner within his team, has intriguingly not given up on the idea. At Ineos, riders are split in two main groups depending on their age.

“We’ve been working hard with the younger group in their preparation,” he said. “That’s where potentially having some very talented French riders in that group would be fantastic.”

LIMA, Peru — Every dawn, on every day, surfers in wetsuits paddle out to take on the famed Peruvian waves. Back on rocky beaches bearing Hawaiian names like Makaha and Waikiki, instructors can be seen training students.

Some here speak about the country’s world surfing champions. Others lay claim to being home to the world’s longest waves, offering a top destination for surfers worldwide. That includes professionals from across the Americas who will compete on huge waves on a reef break 38 miles (60 kilometers) south of Lima when the sport was featured Monday for the first time in the Pan American Games.

“As a Peruvian, I’m so proud that the Pan American Games are being held in Lima, and that for the first time, surfing is included as a sporting discipline,” said Alberto Lopez, who runs one of the dozen or so schools at Makaha beach in Lima’s upscale neighborhood of Miraflores. “Peru really is a gem. All Latin Americans know that Peru is the region’s best surfing destination.”

Surfing is a way of life in Peru, which has been called the Hawaii of Latin America. Sure, millions have marveled at the famed Inca citadel of Machu Picchu and tasted the cuisine that fuses indigenous traditions with European, African and Asian influences through fresh ingredients, including an abundance of seafood from the Pacific Ocean’s chilly Humboldt current. But Peru also is synonymous with surfing.

Some Peruvians go as far as claiming that surfing’s origins can be traced to their homeland, with the pre-Inca Chimu civilization, near northwestern Chicama. Fishermen from the beach town of Huanchaco, 300 miles north of Lima, still ride the waves back to shore with the day’s catch on the same reed boats used by the Chimu, called “caballitos,” or little horses.

Surfing, which also debuts at the 2020 Tokyo Olympics, was long the preserve of Peru’s wealthiest. But the tides changed. Many credit surfing’s popularity and its ability to transcend Peru’s class lines with easier access to inexpensive boards and a homegrown 2004 world surfing champion, Sofia Mulanovich, who ignited a wave-riding fever.

“We’re considered the Hawaii of Latin America because of the frequency of our waves,” said instructor Fernando Vidal, who on a recent morning arrived at Makaha in a rusty van with boards on top. “With our world champions Felipe Pomar and Sofia Mulanovich (and the) internet and Facebook we’ve become well known.”

The first World Championships staged by the International Surfing Federation were held in 1965 on the same Punta Rocas beach where surfers will now compete in the Pan Am Games. They were won by Pomar.

Mulanovich learned to surf when she was a young girl at Waikiki and became the women’s world surfing champion. Her victory brought with it a wave of surf schools that opened on Lima’s coast.

“Surfing in Peru had long been an aristocratic boys-only club. Demographic change had already begun filtering into Latin America’s beaches and lineups, but Mulanovich — compact and sloe-eyed, with a low, fast, tightly coiled wave-riding style — greatly accelerated the process,” the Encyclopedia of Surfing says. “By the late 2000s, roughly half of Peru’s surfers were from the expanding middle class, and among this new generation there was a small but fast-growing number of females.”

These days, teenagers in board shorts, jet-setting surfers, locals and curious tourists share the breaking waves.

In his black wetsuit, a barefooted Hector Vega recently bobbed like a penguin next to a highway carrying his board to a rocky break. Thick fog blanketed the horizon, but he was undaunted.

“It’s very addictive. In a way it’s like flying,” said Vega, a 61-year-old who began surfing at age 15. “In this country we’re lucky that any day of the year, we have one beach, one spot that will yield good waves.”

One big bonus: The breaks along Peru’s 1,500-mile desert coast hit all year long, fed by the Humboldt current and uninterrupted by land masses. That has brought fame to the northern Chicama beach, home to some of the world’s longest waves and a top destination for the most daring surfers — even before the Beach Boys sang about the “shores of Peru” in their 1962 hit “Surfin’ Safari.”

“I consider Peru second only to Hawaii in the evolution of the sport,” former professional surfer and lawmaker Fred Hemmings told The Associated Press in a telephone interview from Kailua, Hawaii. In 1968, Honolulu-born Hemmings was the winner of the World Surfing Championships.

Hemmings praised Peruvian surf contest organizer Eduardo Arena who in 1964 founded the International Surfing Federation, and later headed the World Surfing Championships. Like many others, Hemmings also credits Carlos Dogny with popularizing surfing.

Dogny, the son of a sugar cane magnate, fell in love with surfing when he studied in Hawaii in the 1930s, and he escaped Lima’s long winter months in search of his own “Endless Summer” about three decades before the surfing documentary by that name was released. Dogny returned to his home from Hawaii sometime in the late 1930s or early 1940s with a huge wooden board, a gift from Duke Kahanamoku, seen as the father of modern surfing.

In 1942, Dogny co-founded the Club Waikiki, at the time a wooden shack bathroom on Costa Verde where they kept their boards. The club swelled to hundreds of members and includes a restaurant, tennis courts and a pool where three gigantic wooden boards are on display.

The white one in the middle was Duke’s gift to Dogny, said Victor Curo, a 79-year-old former potato farmer from the highlands, who has cared for surfboards at the Waikiki for 60 years. “Mamico,” as he is best known, recalled how it took two people to haul the mammoth board. Curo also opened a wooden door to a surfboard room named after him with a plaque commemorating his 50 years of service at Waikiki on the entrance.

“We have more than 1,000 boards here,” he said proudly. “Many have also sent me gifts,” he said, pointing to walls packed with framed pictures by pro surfers, including Hemmings, who first came to the Waikiki in 1964. In Hemmings’ dedication, he thanked Mamico for also helping his grandsons when they visited in 2017.

“Mamico did with my grandchildren what he did with me 50 years ago: He greeted them with open arms,” Hemmings said. “It’s the hospitality and gracefulness that he’s known for. He’s part of my Peruvian family.”

Kwame Amoaku is the new director of the Chicago Film Office under Mayor Lori Lightfoot. When Amoaku was a locations manager, he handled high-pressure tasks.

ON LOCATION

BY NINA METZ

Last October, as Richard Moskal was preparing to retire after 23 years as head of the Chicago Film Office, I asked about the wildest request he fielded during his tenure. He told me about an idea floated (and then later abandoned) by Michael Bay during the making of "Transformers: Dark of the Moon" that would have recreated a stunt from the 1980 Steve McQueen movie "The Hunter" in which a car zooms off the parking deck of one of the Marina City towers into the river.

Bay wanted to do it with multiple cars — on fire. When I told the story to Kwame Amoaku, who took over as the director of the city's film office earlier this month, it prompted a knowing laugh. "But that's what you have to do," he said. "You have to take these requests and think them all the way through and figure out: 'Is there a way to possibly do this?' And sometimes the answer is no. But you've got to at least try. I mean, the sheer logistics of making these productions work inside of a working city is a daunting task."

All of that becomes even more complicated when the number of projects in town increases, as it has on the TV side over the past few years. With 500-plus scripted shows available on one format or another each year, studios are in need of shooting locations that have available studio space and offer film incentives (Illinois offers a 30% tax credit) and it's possible Chicago could see an even higher uptick in series based here.

While the state film office focuses on job creation by helping to bring TV and movie projects to Illinois, the city film office has a different mandate: Primarily as the on-the-ground liaison between productions and the city itself — everything from street closure permits to coordinating extraordinary requests (cars aflame launched off Marina City, say) that involve sign-off by various city agencies.

Getting buy-in from those agencies can be a challenge. "Their job is to make sure the city keeps running and anything that looks like it can stop that, they're going to push up against, absolutely," Amoaku said. "But it's now my job to let them see that, yes, this could be an inconvenience, but we can make it work."

(Jamey Lundblad, the chief marketing officer for the Chicago Department of Cultural Affairs and Special Events, was present during our interview Monday.)

Amoaku comes to the job with a number of years experience on the other side of that equation, as the location manager for NBC's "Chicago Fire."

"I started with the show Episode 2, Season 1. The seventh season (which wrapped this past spring) was my last."

Field Museum's Emily Graslie set to host national TV series

Her 'Prehistoric Road Trip' for PBS will be produced in Chicago

BY STEVE JOHNSON

Emily Graslie, YouTube star and the Field Museum's Chief Curiosity Correspondent, will host a new national PBS series exploring the geology and vast fossil history of her native South Dakota and surrounding states.

"Prehistoric Road Trip" is being produced by Chicago's WTTW-Ch. 11 and will be three one-hour episodes spanning, Graslie said, "about 2.5 billion years. Just half of Earth's history, that's all."

PBS was set to announce the show Monday at the annual Television Critics Association press tour in Beverly Hills, Calif.

Slated to air on the national PBS prime-time schedule in summer 2020, the series will combine Graslie's personal history — her family's farm in western South Dakota is less than six miles from the spot where the Field's great fossil T. rex Sue was discovered, she said — with the story of life on Earth across the Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming and Nebraska.

In press release-speak, it's an "immersive adventure" in which

"I want people to re-examine the relationship they have with the natural world, with fossils," Graslie said in a phone interview from her hotel room on a rare day off in shooting the series. "I would love for people to walk away with a sense of wonder and awe for geology, because it's amazing. And I really would love people to have a sense of deep time."

Other Chicagoans to host national PBS series this decade include University of Chicago fish paleontologist Neil Shubin ("Your Inner Fish") and "Wait, Wait ... Don't Tell Me!" host Peter Sagal ("Constitution USA").

The Field hired Graslie, now 30, back in 2013 on the strength of her YouTube series. "The Kathy Griffin is promoting her film, which is scheduled to run in theaters one day only: Wednesday.

Griffin still hustling after Trump debacle

Kathy Griffin says two days into the fallout of her 2017 photo posing with a fake severed head of President Donald Trump, she knew she should film what was happening.

She was losing jobs, making headline news and the topic of widespread scrutiny, not to mention the subject of a government investigation into whether she was a credible threat.

"I kept saying, 'I think this is an important, historic story,'" Griffin said. "The president and the Department of Justice shouldn't make you unemployable and uninsurable."

The problem was that no one wanted anything to do with her. So she picked up her iPhone and began filming. There's no glam, no production crew — not even microphones. Griffin says she just knew she needed to capture what was happening in the moment and to keep it real.

The result is a feature film, "Kathy Griffin: A Hell of a Story," that's part documentary, part comedy special. She financed it herself and carried a poster from interview to interview on a recent press day.

"Look, I made it at Kinko's, OK? I'm still on the D-list," she quipped, referring to the Bravo reality series that earned her two Emmy Awards.

The film was well-received at SXSW earlier this year. Fathom Events agreed to show it Wednesday in 700 U.S. theaters. What happens next is anyone's guess — Griffin just knows she will keep hustling and she's not giving up.

"I just want people to know you don't have to go down. You can take a few punches, but after I kick the bucket, I want somebody to go, 'You know that crazy redhead? They got her but she didn't go down.'"

Gift of violin creates family discord

Dear Amy: My best friend, "Betsy," recently gave a used violin to my adult son. She had the bow restrung and other repairs made before giving it to him.

The violin was used by her children when they were young (they, too, are now adults).

My friend recognizes my son's musical ability, and she wanted to encourage that. He is self-taught and plays the piano, guitar and drums. He also suffers with rather severe health problems. He is in constant pain, and music is one way for him to forget about that. It was such a kind, loving and generous thing for Betsy to do!

Here's the problem: When her son and daughter found out, they were very upset that she had given the violin away without asking them first.

They want her to get it back. She asked me to approach my son. I told him, and he was very hurt that she would ask for it back. I'm leaving it at that.

Betsy now plans to ask my son directly for its return. I don't know who is right or wrong. To complicate things, our sons are friends. We have known each other for 20 years!

— Stuck in the Middle

Dear Stuck: Unless dealing with a family heirloom, when adult children leave their childhood home and leave their musical instruments (sports equipment, etc.) behind, their folks have the right to do what they want with these items, unless there has been a specific arrangement for the parents to store them.

Counting on your mom to hold onto your broken violin indefinitely, just in case you want to reclaim it, is not an assumption that adults living outside the home get to make.

This is my (unsolicited) advice for "Betsy": When your adult children complained about your choice to repair and give away this violin, you could/should have said, "Kids, you never led me to believe that you wanted this instrument, and so I've recycled it by giving it to someone I care about who will use it. You snooze, you lose."

Betsy seems to think taking this violin back will fix this, but it won't. If she believes she has made a mistake giving it away, she needs to own it and apologize to her kids (but not give in to them). She should not ask your son to return this gift.

If she is determined to reclaim it, she will have to face the awkwardness toward your son, as well as the embarrassment toward you.

You aren't actually stuck in the middle, and I suggest that you keep it that way.

Dear Amy: My girlfriend and I have been together for seven years. She is 58 and I am 52.

I've always liked everything about her, but then she decided she wanted to drop a few pounds.

At first I was fine with it, but her weight loss didn't stop at a few pounds. Now she doesn't look healthy.

Her kids agreed with me that she doesn't look well, and now she says she is trying to gain some weight back, but nothing is working.

Is it possible that you can lose weight and not be

— Confused Boyfriend

Dear Confused: Your girlfriend should see her doctor.

She might have an eating disorder, a thyroid disorder or another underlying health problem interfering with her ability to maintain a healthy weight.

Or she might be completely healthy but not at the weight you want her to be. (If that is the case, then you'll need to find a way to accept this change in her.)

Please encourage her to get a medical assessment, just to make sure everything is OK.

Dear Amy: I have been a professional dog trainer for 12 years and would like to caution you about the use of the word "alpha" when giving people advice about dog training.

In your response to "Doggone," while you wisely steered toward hiring a professional to help teach the dog to sleep on a dog bed on the floor rather than in bed with the people, you also made a quip about "alpha"-style leadership.

Positive reinforcement and relationship-based trainers and behaviorists everywhere fight against the alpha approach, which uses dominance, punishment and aversive techniques to train dogs.

Emily Graslie's next move is from YouTube to a national TV audience with a three-part series on PBS.

Brain Scoop,” subtitled “Adventures in Taxidermy, Biology and Natural History,” had 140,000 YouTube subscribers and developed a passionate following especially among women and girls interested in science.

Now based at the Field, among the nation’s leading natural history museums, “The Brain Scoop” has grown to 510,000 subscribers as Graslie, in a series of videos typically running about 10 minutes, explores topics ranging from “Why did King Tut have a flat head?” to “The Amazing Laser” to “Beetles, Mites, Cockroaches, Oh My!”, an exploration of the museum’s insect collection.

With Graslie as executive producer, host and star, “Prehistoric Road Trip” will preserve some of the tone of “The Brain Scoop,” which puts her passion for learning about science at the forefront.

But it’ll be “more polished,” she said, including being shot in 4K resolution. “This is the biggest thing I’ve ever done in my life,” she said.

Where “Brain Scoop” episodes are usually made by her and a videographer, on the PBS show, “we’ve got myself plus six working on it. By the time we’re done, we will have been filming for eight or nine weeks. We have a drone. That’s awesome. But at the heart of it, it’s still me. I’m leading the charge in terms of the tone I want to capture.”

The series is a coup for WTTW, as well. “It’s very important to us,” said Geoffrey Baer, the program host and producer and the channel’s new vice president of original content production. “A lot of the national programming tends to be bi-coastal, and we’re sort of forgotten in the middle of the country. We want to be sure we put a stake in the ground and are contributing to what people across the country are seeing.”

Added Baer, “Emily is just a treasure.”

The show began with a conversation that included Graslie, then-WTTW chief content officer Dan Soles and Field CEO Richard Lariviere in the latter’s museum office in the fall of 2017.

“Dan throws me this question,” Graslie said. “‘If I could make an hourlong documentary about anything, what would I do?’ And of course I hadn’t really thought about it, but I had to have an answer.”

She drew on her family history and the West and they took a concept for a documentary hour to PBS in January 2018. “I start giving this pitch: ‘Western South Dakota has an amazing fossil record, and I’m from there, and I miss it, and I want to bring a camera crew.’”

The PBS executive responded, according to Graslie, “‘We’d like you to think outside of one state, and we’d like you to do three hours.’ So this is just the best problem to have, right?”

PBS chief programming executive Perry Simon, in the news release Monday, called the series “unlike anything we’ve presented before” and stressed Graslie’s “unique talent with an amazing and dedicated YouTube fan base.”

For her part, Graslie said, “It’s really important to me that this be a public broadcasting role. Occasionally I have been approached by major cable networks to do shows, but PBS is the one for me. I grew up on South Dakota Public Broadcasting.”

After several more weeks shooting in the west, she said, they’ll do the final expected shoots back in Chicago at the Field, which is scientific consultant on the series. “You can’t make a dinosaur documentary without filming Sue, of course,” she said.

work we’ve done here speaks for itself and it has been good work.”

He’s an interesting guy, Kelly, in part because he is not a person who rose to his position by knocking doors as a precinct captain. He accepted his DCASE job after more than three decades as an administrator at Columbia College. The work he has been doing with his DCASE colleagues has resulted in many interesting and some innovative things. “I think we’ve been able to take DCASE from being a dynamic special events presenter,” he said, “into being a dynamic organizer of the cultural landscape of the city.”

He has only met the new mayor a few times. Nothing formal, but rather such things as a walk with one another through Taste of Chicago.

This Saturday he will be wandering the 800 block of S. Desplaines Street, taking the measure of one of his latest creations. It is called “The Big Deal” and it is Kelly’s attempt to inject new life into what has been for the last decade the Maxwell Street Market. “The Big Deal” will be 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Sunday; more at maxwellstreetmarket.us.

“During the first week on this job I was informed that the city was closing the market and I said, ‘Over my dead body.’” Kelly said. “I wanted to keep it and make it a cultural mecca again.”

Of course, the original Maxwell Street market did not call itself the Maxwell Street Market. It was an area spreading out from the corner of Maxwell and Halsted Streets and from the 1880s into the 1990s was a human quilt of various immigrant groups. People lived and worked there, many of them at the marketplace that also attracted others from across the city, to buy and to sell things, to play and listen to the blues, eat food and in other ways taste new cultures. Vibrant and wild, it was an essential piece of the city. But in the early 1990s the University of Illinois-Chicago gobbled it up.

“I can still remember seeing it for the first time,” said Kelly, a native South Sider now in his mid-60s. “I was with my dad, maybe 9 or 10 years old, and it was cold, not bitter winter cold but there were fires burning in big garbage cans and people huddled around them to keep warm. And all around us activity. We were in the middle of this wild and gritty expanse, a scene like nothing I had ever seen before. I have never forgotten that, and I remain emotionally connected to it.”

He well knows that it is not possible to recreate the past, but he is determined that the Maxwell Street Market has a vibrant future that acknowledges its past. “There are vendors who have been there for 40 years and we want to honor them,” he said. “We have formed partnerships with various groups and organizations, gotten a grant, are featuring a new beer made especially for this event, and music, lots of music on two stages, and the food, the food. (Famed chef/ restaurateur) Rick Bayless has said the market has the best Mexican street food in the country.”

It is likely the new mayor, Kelly’s boss, might be there. She gets around and last Saturday there she was in Washington Square Park, across from the Newberry Library for the Bughouse Square Debates, an annual gathering of voices, opinions and occasional craziness.

The original Bughouse Square debates were not known as the Bughouse Square Debates but were wildly informal affairs. From the 1880s into the 1930s, people came to the park and stood on soapboxes or crates and spoke of their passions, theories and philosophies to anyone who would listen. Some were famous and smart (Carl Sandburg, Emma Goldman). Many others were anonymous anarchists, poets and preachers. Some of them were, frankly, nuts.

The debates came back to life more than 30 years ago thanks to social historian and author Arthur Weinberg and his wife, Lila, a historian, author and teacher. For years Weinberg served as the event’s emcee, and after his death in 1989, others filled that role, most prominently and exuberantly author/activist Studs Terkel, who had spent some of his formative years listening to the soapbox orators. He wrote of that time in one of his many books: “I doubt whether I learned very much (at the park). One thing I know: I delighted in it. Perhaps none of it made any sense, save one kind: sense of life.”

Mayor Lori Lightfoot was there for the presentation of the John Peter Altgeld Freedom of Speech Award, named for the Illinois governor who courageously pardoned the anarchists wrongly convicted of the 1886 Haymarket bombing. It was given to Derrick Blakley, who recently retired after an admirable 40-year career as a journalist, most of it on television.

The mayor had a few thoughtful words to say about this event and about the bloody anniversary of the city’s 1919 race riots, which was the topic of a later and enlightening on stage discussion between Natalie Moore, the talented WBEZ-FM reporter and the author of the stunning book “The South Side: A Portrait of Chicago and American Segregation,” and Charles Whitaker, a former editor at Ebony Magazine and the recently named dean of the Medill School of Journalism at Northwestern University.

The mayor had to leave before a variety of speakers took to their “soapboxes”; she had other public events scheduled on this typically busy day. So, she missed orations from people on such topics as “Cannabis is Good for Your Money, Health, and Taxes” and “On Being Black in America.” She missed the presentation of the award for best speech, which went to attorney Scott Priz, whose topic was “Trump’s Camps are What We are as a Nation, but It’s Not What We Have to Be.”

I have been attending these debates for decades and, since Terkel’s death in 2008, have served as emcee. Until Saturday I had never seen a mayor show up, let alone say, as Lightfoot did on this sunny and hot day, “This is a great city, we all know this. But we have many things that hold us back. ... Our work to create a more equitable and just society has to continue.”

He said his most complicated ask of the city was for last year’s season opener.

“We were at the old Hard Rock, which is now the St. Jane Hotel in the Carbon and Carbide Building (and we turned it into) a towering inferno. That was a huge negotiation with the building itself because the hotel was just in the midst of opening at the time. Then all the businesses on that street, the hotels, the restaurants, the parking garages. I had to take a lane of Michigan Avenue, which can be disastrous in itself, but we made it work.

“We stayed there for several days and shot an amazing sequence. We had people rappelling out of windows, we had smoke, we had fire. We had 10 fire trucks driving down Wacker and huge aerial shots. It was beautiful, it was like a huge budget movie and I was proud that we were able to pull that off just for episodic television. So that’s an example of how the city can work with productions in order to get these high production value shots, but not shut the city down.”

The film office is part of DCASE and commissioner Mark Kelly said that when former director Moskal retired, he left “tough shoes to fill and we undertook a serious search, but Kwame’s name kept coming up again and again. If you know anything about being a location manager, that’s a high-pressure job of bringing everything together and making sure it happens. So he is going to be a great addition.”

Moskal agreed: “He has the temperament and the discipline but also the experience — he’s a bit of a unicorn in that he’s fully versed in what film production is all about, but he also really knows what it takes to sort of grind the gears of city government to make things possible.”

Amoaku’s varied background in the local TV and film scene took root in college, he said. “I went to school for cinematography at SIU (Southern Illinois University), so behind-the-camera was always my passion. It was what I wanted to do. Acting came as a happy accident and something I could do to make a living.”

His resume includes small roles in TV and film that shot locally: “Early Edition,” “Barbershop,” “Prison Break” and more recently “Chicago Fire.”

“But at the same time I was also a production assistant. I started from the ground up and worked my way through the system, becoming a member of the Directors Guild and moving up through the ranks. I’m a die-hard Chicagoan, born and raised here, mostly on the South Shore. I just have a real true love and an affinity for the city, but also the film business. It’s almost like a family. So when Rich said he was leaving, I felt it was an opportunity for me to step in. I bounce between a lot of different worlds: The commercial world, the independent (film) world, the feature (film) world, the episodic television world. And those worlds don’t necessarily intersect all the time.”

And yet the Chicago Film Office has to service all those areas.

“Exactly. So I’ve been one of the few people who’s moved through all of those worlds in my travels in the film business, not only behind the camera but in front of it as well.”

How did he transition into locations manager?

“I used to work at a photo lab in Piper’s Alley. This was before I started acting, this is before I was a production assistant, this was before anything. Back in the old days, when you’d take pictures, you’d take them to a one-hour photo lab. All the location managers used to come to the lab I worked at, so I met a lot of them back in the day. And one of them had been assigned a rap video. He asked me if I wanted to come with him and knock on some of these doors and that was my first experience doing locations.

“It’s an interesting position because there’s no locations class in film school. You have to have certain skills sets that lend themselves to the position. You have to have a familiarity with the city, but also be able to look at a script and see it cinematically. So it’s helpful to have a cinematographer’s eye or a director’s eye to be able to interpret scripts for real world situations and then marry those two things together.

“Also, the gift of gab is definitely something you need. You’ve got to be able to walk up to a person’s door and say, ‘Hi, you don’t know me from Adam. I want you to let me into your house so I can photograph everything and then I’m going to come back with about 250 people and we’re going to set your house on fire.’ You have to convince people of that, and that takes a great deal of skill.”

But crews aren’t really setting someone’s house on fire, are they?

“Sort of! I’m not going to burn your house down, but I’m going to set your house on fire. So it’s about convincing them that you’re not crazy (laughs) and you’re not a pyromaniac who’s going to burn their house down. But taking that first step — of allowing you into their space to photograph it — is big.”

Amoaku has given some thought to how TV and movie projects affect people who work and live in areas temporarily blocked off by filming and said he wants to “better integrate these productions — basically this entirely new industrial force — into the city’s neighborhoods so that people can see the benefit of it and that it’s not just an inconvenience.

“People think of the movie industry as a bunch of rich Hollywood people. But in fact the industry here has been a huge boon for the blue-collar working class citizens of the city. It’s not necessarily about the marquee stars. It’s about the blue-collar people that are getting these jobs. And these are life-changing, car-buying, house-buying jobs that people are getting. So it’s not just a question of rich people coming here and making you move your car.

“The film office has worked very hard to improve notification for the residents, to give people a clear line of communication between themselves and the production companies so that we’ll know what concerns they have.

“As a city, of course there are always things we could do better. There are things the production companies could do better. But I think we’re definitely in a direction where we realize the importance of keeping the neighborhoods with us, so we’re doing things to get ahead of that so we’re not getting these nuisance calls.”

WATCH THIS: TUESDAY

“Pose” (9 p.m., 10:01 p.m., 12:08 a.m., FX): The members of the House of Evangelista put their heads together to devise an elaborate prank designed to get under the skin of Frederica (guest star Patti LuPone), the conniving real estate magnate, in a new episode called “Blow.” Meanwhile, Angel (Indya Moore) is shaken when she is introduced to an unsavory side of life as a model. Mj Rodriguez, Dominique Jackson and Billy Porter also star.

“CNN Democratic Presidential Debate” (7 p.m., 1 a.m., CNN): From Detroit, CNN anchors Dana Bash, Don Lemon and Jake Tapper moderate the second in a series of debates among candidates for the Democratic presidential nomination. As with June’s initial debate, the event is split over two nights (concluding Wednesday) to accommodate up to 20 hopefuls who have met the qualifications set by the Democratic National Committee, based on polling and financial donations.

“Good Trouble” (7 p.m., FREE): Mariana (Cierra Ramirez) and her team are thrust into an incredibly stressful situation when the launch timeline for her app gets moved up drastically in the new episode “In the Middle.” It certainly doesn’t help matters when Gael (Tommy Martinez) is presented with a potential new opportunity that conflicts with a major presentation. Meanwhile, an aghast Callie (Maia Mitchell) finds herself swept up in a power struggle at the Legal Aid offices.

“The 100” (8 p.m., CW): A special Naming Day leads to changes in virtually everything in Sanctum in the new episode “Adjustment Protocol.” Elsewhere, Gabriel (guest star Chuku Modu) has an unexpected face-to-face encounter with an old friend. Eliza Taylor, Shannon Kook, Bob Morley, Paige Turco, Tasya Teles, Richard Harmon, Marie Avgeropoulos and Lindsey Morgan also star.

“The Real Housewives of Beverly Hills” (8 p.m., 10:30 p.m., Bravo): “Reunion Part 3” wraps up the latest get-together and rehash of this past season, with everyone still a bit nonplussed by how Camille Grammer stormed off at the end of Part 2, evidently over unresolved tensions with her co-stars. Kyle Richards tearfully reflects on the implosion of her long friendship with Lisa Vanderpump.

“60 Days In: Narcoland” (9 p.m., 1 a.m., AE): This new investigative docu-series follows six undercover participants who embed themselves in trafficking hot spots along the Interstate 65 drug corridor that encompasses six counties in Kentucky and Indiana to get a first-hand perspective on the harsh toll the narcotics trade is taking on Middle America.
